39 It is apparent, indeed, from the contents of the file submitted to the Court that the objective of that registration obligation is to establish contractors' professional qualities, for the purposes of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, more particularly as regards their position in respect of the payment of social security contributions and taxes.

40 It is appropriate to point out, first, that the fact that a contractor established in another Member State has produced certificates issued by the competent authorities of that State is not sufficient to confirm, conclusively, that it has fulfilled its obligations in that regard. Indeed, first, points (e) and (f) of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 provide that the contractor must have fulfilled its social security and tax obligations in the contracting authority's Member State also. Secondly, by referring to certificates issued by the competent authority in the Member State concerned, the second indent in the second paragraph of Article 24 permits a separate check on such a contractor in the Member State in which the public contract in question is to be awarded.

41 It is conceivable that the contractor in question may have carried on an economic activity in the contracting authority's Member State capable of giving rise to debts for social security contributions and tax in that Member State. Such debts could arise not only from economic activities carried on in the course of performing public contracts, but also from activities outside that framework. In addition, even if that contractor has not carried on any economic activity in the contracting authority's Member State, it is legitimate for that State's authorities to wish to be able to satisfy themselves of that fact.

42 Consequently, national legislation cannot be regarded as being contrary to the rules of the Union solely because it lays down a registration obligation for the purposes of such a check also for contractors established in a Member State other than that in which the public contract is to be awarded.

43 It is appropriate to point out, secondly, that according to the Court's settled case-law, the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 lists, exhaustively, the grounds capable of justifying the exclusion of a contractor from participation in a contract which relate solely to its professional qualities. Moreover, the Court also added that Member States have the right to provide, in addition to the grounds for exclusion expressly referred to in that provision, for grounds for exclusion designed to ensure observance of the principles of equal treatment and transparency (see, to that effect, Case C-213/07 Michaniki [2008] ECR I-9999, paragraphs 43, 44 and 47, and Case C-538/07 Assitur [2009] ECR I-4219, paragraphs 20 and 21).

44 A registration obligation such as that in question in the main proceedings cannot be regarded as an additional ground for exclusion, in addition to those exhaustively listed in the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, if it is designed as a means of implementing that provision, solely to check the evidence that a contractor wishing to participate in a public contract does not fall fowl of one of those grounds for exclusion, particularly those relating to the payment of social security contributions and taxes.

45 In this case, for the purposes of the registration in question, commonly referred to as ‘registration for tax purposes’ in the documents in the Court file, the contractor concerned must submit, to the authority competent for that purpose, an application, accompanied by the certificates provided for in the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 and required by the applicable national legislation which lays down the corresponding grounds for exclusion.

46 Thus, a contractor established in another Member State must produce to that authority the certificates issued by the authorities of its Member State of establishment which it should usually submit, under the above provision of Directive 93/37, to the contracting authority concerned. Also, if such a contractor had already carried on an economic activity in the contracting authority’s Member State, it should be able to submit the certificates issued by the competent authorities of that State or else, if it had not carried on such an activity, be in a position to declare that fact. The authority in question must, for its part, certify the absence of grounds for exclusion by granting a registration certificate which will, subsequently, have to be submitted to the contracting authority for the purposes of participation in the public contract in question.

47 Under the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, where the contracting authority requires of the contractor proof that the cases referred to in points (e) and (f) of that provision do not apply to it, the authority is to accept as sufficient evidence a certificate issued by the competent authority in the Member State concerned.

48 That provision does not preclude a check being made, before the tenders are opened, of the certificates submitted by a contractor or of the absence, in its case, of grounds for exclusion in general.

49 None the less, that check must be confined to the professional qualities of contractors, for the purposes of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, particularly as regards the fulfilment of their obligations in respect of social security contributions and taxes. In addition, as the Advocate General points out in paragraph 52 of her Opinion, it may not complicate or delay the participation of the contractor concerned in the procedure for the award of the public contract or give rise to excessive administrative charges.

50 It is for the referring court to determine whether the registration obligation in question in the main proceedings satisfies those criteria.

51 The referring court must, in particular, examine whether the requirements laid down in Article 2(1)(7) of the Royal Decree of 1978, under which a company is excluded from participating in a public contract if among its directors, managers or persons empowered to enter into obligations on its behalf are persons who are prohibited from performing such tasks under the national legislation, and in Article 2(1)(12) of the Royal Decree of 1978, under which the participation of a contractor in a procedure for the award of a public contract is precluded if it does not possess ‘sufficient financial, administrative and technical resources to ensure fulfilment of [its] tax and social security obligations’, on which points the contents of the court file do not provide sufficient materials for their determination, may be authorised by the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37.

52 It is, however, apparent from the contents of the Court file that the mere production, to the contracting authority, of the application for registration accompanied by the submission of the tender constituted sufficient compliance, in the case in the main proceedings, to admit the contractors concerned to participate in the contract at issue, since the decision to award the contract could not be made before the conclusion of the registration procedure.

53 In view of the foregoing, the reply to the first question is that the law of the Union is to be interpreted as not precluding national legislation which imposes on a contractor established in another Member

State, in order to be awarded a contract in the contracting authority's Member State, an obligation to hold a registration, in the latter Member State, certifying that none of the grounds for exclusion listed in the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 applies to the contractor, provided that such obligation does not hinder or delay the contractor's participation in the public contract in question or give rise to excessive administrative charges, and provided that its sole objective is to check the professional qualities of the contractor concerned, for the purposes of that provision.

The second question

54 By this question, the national court is asking, in essence, whether the general principles of the law of the Union on public procurement and the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 are to be interpreted as precluding national legislation which provides for a check, by an authority such as that in question in the main proceedings, of certificates issued by the tax and social security authorities of other Member States attesting that contractors established in those Member States have fulfilled their obligations in the areas concerned.

55 In that regard, it is appropriate to point out that the provisions of Directive 93/37 do not, as a matter of principle, preclude national law from entrusting a check of the absence of grounds for exclusion, for the purposes of the first paragraph of Article 24 of that directive, to an authority other than the contracting authority.

56 As the Advocate General points out in paragraph 69 of her Opinion, such a check, prior to the opening of tenders, may be appropriate for the purposes of the proper conduct of a public contract. Indeed, in view of the possibly insufficient technical expertise and limited organisational capacities of certain contracting authorities, such as, for example, a local authority of modest size or an organisation with few staff, it may be appropriate to entrust to a specialist authority, with powers at the national or local level, the administrative treatment and the centralised checking of the evidence concerning the professional qualities of the candidates for different public contracts.

57 It is appropriate to add that the Court, in its judgment in Michaniki, has already accepted, under well defined conditions, the possibility that an authority other than the contracting authority may adopt a decision leading to the exclusion of a contractor from a procedure for the award of a public works contract. In that regard, it is irrelevant that the subject matter of the case which led to that judgment was not a ground for exclusion under Directive 93/37, but a ground for exclusion established in addition to those defined by that directive and intended to ensure compliance with the principles of equal treatment and transparency.

58 The Court must also consider whether the composition and powers of the authority to which, under the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings, that check is entrusted can be reconciled with the objective of ensuring compliance with the law of the Union on public procurement.

59 In that regard, it is clear, first, from the contents of the Court file that, under that legislation, the competent authorities in respect of registration, 'Registration Committees', are established at provincial level with tripartite composition. Under Article 16 of the Royal Decree of 1978, they are composed of three officials appointed by the public authorities, one of whom assumes the chairmanship, and six persons, three of whom are appointed on the proposal of the organisations representing employers and three on the proposal of the organisations representing workers in the construction sector in the province in question.

60 The majority on those authorities is composed of persons representing private interests and nothing in the Court file indicates that their participation in them is purely consultative.

61 Such authorities, in view of their composition, cannot be regarded as impartial and neutral. Indeed, that majority participation of representatives of private interests could lead those representatives to obstruct the access of other operators to the market concerned and, in any event, because such operators are obliged to submit to the determination of their potential competitors as regards their personal and professional qualities, such an authority involves a situation of unequal conditions of competition and lack of objectivity and impartiality, inconsistent with a system of undistorted competition, such as that laid down by the law of the Union (see, by analogy, Case C-49/07 MOTOE [2008] ECR I-4863, paragraphs 51 and 52 and the case-law cited, and Case C-169/07 Hartlauer [2009] ECR I-1721, paragraph 51 and case-law cited).

62 It is appropriate, secondly, to draw attention to the fact that, as seems to be clear from the referring court's question, the legislation at issue in the main proceedings confers on registration committees power to examine the validity of the certificates issued by the competent authority of the Member State concerned as regards contractors' fulfilment of their social security and tax obligations.

63 The Royal Decree of 1978 contains no provision expressly conferring such power on registration committees, and the scope of such power is not set out in the referring court's request. If that power must involve the exercise of a check as regards the substance of the requirements which underlie the issue of certificates by the competent authorities of the Member States concerned, it would be clearly incompatible with the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, which does not provide for such a ground for exclusion, and with the second indent of the second paragraph of that article, which unequivocally requires the acceptance of those certificates as sufficient evidence of the fulfilment of contractors' social security and tax obligations. Moreover, a ground for exclusion founded on a check as regards the substance of those certificates would not be justified on the basis of the result reached by the Court in Michaniki.

64 Therefore, as the Advocate General points out in paragraphs 82 to 84 of her Opinion, the authority responsible for examining those certificates has no discretion of its own as regards their substance and must confine itself to a summary check of their formal elements. It may thus check only the authenticity of the certificates, whether they were established on a sufficiently recent date and whether the authority which issued them manifestly lacked the power to do so.

65 It is for the referring court to determine the situation of the appellants in the main proceedings in the light of the rulings on interpretation set forth above. However, it does not appear that the composition of the Registration Committee and the extent of the check it carried out could have affected that situation, since, as is clear from the contents of the Court file, the appellants obtained their registration without difficulty. The reason why they were not admitted to participate in the contract in question in the main proceedings is based on the fact that their respective applications for registration had been submitted late, that is to say after the expiry of the time-limit for submitting tenders, in circumstances in which the requirement to hold a registration is not regarded, in itself, as being contrary to the law of the Union.

66 In the light of the foregoing considerations, the reply to the second question is that the law of the Union is to be interpreted as precluding national legislation under which the checking of the certificates issued to a contractor of another Member State by the tax and social security authorities of that Member State is entrusted to an authority other than the contracting authority where:

– the majority on that other authority is composed of persons appointed by the employers' and workers' organisations in the construction sector of the province in which the public contract in question is to be awarded, and

– that power extends to a check on the substance of the validity of those certificates.

Costs

67 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby rules:

1. The law of the Union is to be interpreted as not precluding national legislation which imposes on a contractor established in another Member State, in order to be awarded a contract in the contracting authority's Member State, an obligation to hold a registration, in the latter Member State, certifying that none of the grounds for exclusion listed in the first paragraph of Article 24 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts applies to the contractor, provided that such obligation does not hinder or delay the contractor's participation in the public contract in question or give rise to excessive administrative charges, and provided that its sole objective is to check the professional qualities of the contractor concerned, for the purposes of that provision.

2. The law of the Union is to be interpreted as precluding national legislation under which the checking of the certificates issued to a contractor of another Member State by the tax and social security authorities of that Member State is entrusted to an authority other than the contracting authority where:

– the majority on that other authority is composed of persons appointed by the employers' and workers' organisations in the construction sector of the province in which the public contract in question is to be awarded, and

– that power extends to a check on the substance of the validity of those certificates.

OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL
KOKOTT
delivered on 15 April 2010 1

Case C-74/09

Bâtiments et Ponts Construction SA and Others

(Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Cour de cassation (Belgium))

(Freedom to provide services – Public works contracts – Qualitative criteria – Professional quality – Grounds for exclusion – Proof of due payment of taxes and social security contributions – Requirement that contractors be registered in national territory – Application of the registration requirement also to foreign tenderers – Recognition of certificates issued by the authorities of the country of origin – Directive 93/37/EEC)

I – Introduction

1. Like the Rüffert case, (2) these preliminary-ruling proceedings concern the social components of public procurement law. They raise the question of the means by which the authorities of the Member State in which a public works contract is to be awarded may verify whether the building contractors party to the public procurement procedure fulfil their obligations relating to the payment of taxes and social security contributions.

2. The background to this case is formed by the procurement law section of the refurbishment and renovation of the famous Berlaymont Building in Brussels in which the European Commission has its principal administrative headquarters. (3) A consortium whose member companies were not all registered in Belgium for tax purposes was among those party to the procedure for awarding the work. However, at that time such registration for tax purposes was provided for in Belgian procurement law and was also one of the tender conditions in the present case. It served primarily to ensure that tenderers for public works contracts had duly fulfilled, and would duly fulfil, their obligations relating to the payment of taxes and social security contributions.

3. The Court is asked to clarify whether such a registration requirement can be applied also to tenderers established in other Member States or whether the contracting authority must be content with the submission of certificates issued by the authorities of the land of origin attesting to the due payment of taxes and social security contributions.

II – Legal framework

A – EU law background

4. The EU law background to this case is defined by Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (4) – now no longer in force –, in particular by Articles 24 to 29 thereof concerning the qualitative criteria (Title IV, Chapter 2, of Directive 93/37).

5. Article 24 of Directive 93/37 was worded as follows:

‘Any contractor may be excluded from participation in the contract who:

(e) has not fulfilled obligations relating to the payment of social security contributions in accordance with the legal provisions of the country in which he is established or with those of the country of the contracting authority;

(f) has not fulfilled obligations relating to the payment of taxes in accordance with the legal provisions of the country in which he is established or those of the country of the contracting authority;

Where the contracting authority requires of the contractor proof that none of the cases quoted in (a), (b), (c), (e) or (f) applies to him, it shall accept as sufficient evidence:

– for points (e) or (f), a certificate issued by the competent authority in the Member State concerned.

6. Article 28 of Directive 93/37 provided:

‘Within the limits of Articles 24 to 27, the contracting authority may invite the contractor to supplement the certificates and documents submitted or to clarify them.’

7. Article 29 of Directive 93/37 contained the following rules:

‘(1) Member States who have official lists of recognised contractors must adapt them to the provisions of Article 24(a) to (d) and (g) and of Articles 25, 26 and 27.

(2) Contractors registered in the official lists may, for each contract, submit to the contracting authority a certificate of registration issued by the competent authority. This certificate shall state the reference which enabled them to be registered in the list and the classification given in this list.

(3) Certified registration in the official lists by the competent bodies shall, for the contracting authorities of other Member States, constitute a presumption of suitability for works corresponding to the contractor’s classification only as regards Articles 24(a) to (d) and (g), 25, 26(b) and (c) and 27(b) and (d).

Information which can be deduced from registration in official lists may not be questioned. However, with regard to the payment of social security contributions, an additional certificate may be required of any registered contractor whenever a contract is offered.

The contracting authorities of other Member States shall apply the above provisions only in favour of contractors who are established in the country holding the official list.

(4) For the registration of contractors of other Member States in an official list, no further proofs and statements may be required other than those requested of nationals and, in any event, only those provided for under Articles 24 to 27.

(5) Member States holding an official list shall communicate to other Member States the address of the body to which requests for registration may be made.'

8. Since the award procedure at issue was carried out before 31 January 2006, Directive 2004/18/EC (5) is of no relevance to the present case.

9. In addition, reference should be made to the provisions on freedom to provide services. However, contrary to what is taken as a basis in the order for reference and some of the documents submitted to the Court, recourse in that regard must be had not to Articles 49 and 50 EC, but to Articles 59 and 60 of the EC Treaty. (6) That is because the facts in the main proceedings took place before 1 May 1999, the date on which the Amsterdam Treaty entered into force. (7)

The Royal Decree of 1977

10. As regards Belgian law, the Royal Decree of 22 April 1977 concerning public works, supply and service contracts (8) is relevant. Section 2 of this decree, which is headed 'Drawing up the tender' contains an Article 15 which provides, in extract, as follows:

(3) A Belgian tenderer which employs staff to whom the Law of 27 June 1969 amending the Decree-Law of 28 December 1944 on social security for workers applies must, for his tender to be regarded as valid, attach thereto a certificate of the National Social Security Office stating that he has paid social security and subsistence protection contributions or present such a certificate to the administration before the opening of tenders …

(4) A foreign tenderer must, for his tender to be regarded as valid, attach thereto or present to the administration before the opening of tenders:

(a) a certificate issued by the competent authority stating that the tenderer has complied with its obligations relating to the payment of social security contributions in accordance with the legal provisions of the country in which it is established …

(7) A tenderer must, for his tender to be regarded as valid, be registered as a contractor pursuant to Article 299bis of the Income Tax Code and Article 30bis of the Law of 27 June 1969 amending the Decree-Law of 28 December 1944 on social security for workers.'

The Royal Decree of 1978

11. The detailed rules on registration for tax purposes provided for in Article 15(7) of the Royal Decree of 1977 are laid down in the Royal Decree of 5 October 1978. (9) Section 1 of this decree lays down the 'Conditions to be satisfied in order to be registered as a contractor' and contains an Article 2 which provides as follows:

'Registration as a contractor … shall be granted only to contractors which satisfy the following conditions:

2. in respect of an activity within the meaning of Article 1, they must be registered in the companies' register or professional register in accordance with the requirements laid down in the legal provisions of the Member State in which they are established;

7. where a company is involved, the directors, managers or persons empowered to enter into obligations on behalf of the company may not include any persons who are prohibited for performing such tasks under Royal Decree No 22 of 24 October 1934 referred to in subparagraph 6;

10. they may not have committed, during the five year period preceding the application for registration, any repeated or serious infringements relating to tax obligations …;

11. they may not, at the time of registration, be in arrears with the payment of taxes, contributions to be levied by the National Social Security Office or contributions levied by the Subsistence Protection Fund or on its behalf; …;

12. they must possess sufficient financial, administrative and technical resources to ensure fulfilment of their tax and social security obligations.'

12. Under Article 8 of the Royal Decree of 1978, in order to register as a contractor it is necessary to submit an application to the Chairman of the Registration Committee (10) of the province in which the applicant has its principal place of business. In the case of applicants which are not established in Belgium, the committee of the province in which the construction site in question is situated is to be competent.

13. Article 10 of the Royal Decree of 1978 provides as follows:

'(1) For it not to be inadmissible, the following documents must be attached to the application:

3. from each applicant: a copy of the entry in the professional register on the conditions laid down in the legal provisions of the country in which it is established …

5. from a [foreign] applicant: certificates issued by the competent authority in the Member State concerned stating and confirming that it is not in arrears with the payment of taxes or social security contributions in that Member State.

(2) The registration committee within the meaning of Section 4 below can require the applicant to provide further documents or information which it deems necessary to determine whether or not the conditions laid down in Article 2(1) have been fulfilled.

14. The composition of the registration committee is governed by Article 16 of the Royal Decree of 1978:

'(1) Each registration committee shall be composed of nine members which We shall appointed in accordance with the procedures set out below:

1. three official members shall be appointed at the proposal of, respectively,

(a) the Minister for Social Security;

(b) the Minister for Finance;

(c) the Minister for Employment and Work;

2. three members shall be appointed at the proposal of the organisations representing employers in the construction industry;

3. three members shall be appointed at the proposal of the organisations representing employees in the construction industry;

(2) Each committee shall be chaired by one of the officials within the meaning of Article 1(1)(a) and (b) who shall be appointed by Us for this purpose at the proposal of the two ministers referred to therein …'

III – Facts and main proceedings

15. The Berlaymont Building was constructed between 1963 and 1967 on land in Brussels acquired by the Belgian State in 1960 and has served ever since as the principal administrative headquarters of the European Commission. (11) However, between 1992 and 2004 the Commission was unable to use the building as it had to be renovated and have its asbestos removed from it.

16. On 18 September 1990 Berlaymont 2000 SA, (12) a limited company incorporated under Belgium law, was set up for the purpose of this refurbishment and renovation work. Three credit institutions had a holding in the company in addition to Régie des Bâtiments, (13) a Belgian legal person established under public law. Berlaymont 2000's responsibilities included drawing up the relevant conditions, a programme of work, and the budget for the construction work necessary for the refurbishment and renovation. The company was granted permission to build on the Berlaymont site.

17. On 23 December 1994 Berlaymont 2000 invited tenders for the refurbishment and renovation work on the Berlaymont Building, (14) the value of which was estimated at around BEF 1.4 billion. (15) In respect of this invitation to tender special conditions were drawn up and a contract notice was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities. (16) Article 1.G of the special conditions stated: 'As regards the works which form the subject-matter of the present contract, the contractor must be registered in Belgium.'

18. An amendment to the award notice appeared in the Official Journal (17) on 16 February 1995; it provided additional information, inter alia with regard to the registration requirement on tenderers. In particular Article 1.G of the special conditions was reworded as follows:

'As regards the works which form the subject-matter of the present contract, the contractor must furnish proof that it is regarded as having fulfilled its obligations relating to social security contributions, tax and VAT; this proof must be contained in a "registration".

The application for registration is to be made in accordance with the [Royal Decree of 1978].

As regards the validity of the tender (at the time it is submitted), it will be sufficient for a copy of the application for registration to be attached to the tender. No decision to award the contract will be taken before the competent authority has ruled on the application (for registration).'

Finally, the amendment notice stated:

'In its tender, the tenderer will confirm that it has taken account of this amendment notice No 1, failing which its tender will be void.'

19. 16 March 1995 was set as the time-limit for submitting tenders.

20. The Belgium-registered undertaking Bâtiments et Ponts Construction SA (BPC) and the German undertaking WIG Industrieinstandhaltung GmbH (WIG), which did not hold a registration in Belgium at that time, established the consortium BPC-WIG in order to participate in the Berlaymont tender proceedings. WIG subsequently traded under the name Thyssenkrupp Industrieservice GmbH; during the preliminary-ruling proceedings before the Court it changed its name for a second time to WISAG Produktionsservice GmbH (WISAG).

21. On 16 March 1995 the BPC-WIG consortium submitted a tender for the Berlaymont construction contract. It did not attach to this tender confirmation of either its own registration or that of its member undertaking WIG in Belgium. The applications for registration in Belgium were not submitted until after the expiry of the time-limit for submitting tenders for the Berlaymont contract, that is to say by BPC-WIG on 28 April 1995 and by WIG on 3 May 1995. These registrations were not granted until July 1995, which was after the Berlaymont contract was awarded. (18)

22. However, a certificate issued by the German tax authorities (19) dated 4 August 1994 and a certificate issued by the German social security body (20) dated 3 February 1995 were attached to the tender submitted by BPC-WIG. They showed that the German tax administration had no objections to WIG's participation in a public works contract; for its part, the German social security administration confirmed that all social security contributions had always been paid punctually by WIG.

23. On 20 June 2005 the board of directors of Berlaymont 2000 awarded the contract to a rival consortium. BPC and WIG brought administrative proceedings against this decision before the Belgian Council of State. (21) On 10 March 1999 the Council of State dismissed the proceedings brought by them on the grounds that WIG could not demonstrate registration in Belgium at the time the tender was submitted and had not submitted a relevant application, and therefore BPC-WIG was ineligible as a contractor from the outset. (22)

24. In parallel with the administrative proceedings before the Belgian Council of State BPC and WIG brought before the Tribunal de première instance de Bruxelles (23) on 18 June 1996 a civil action for damages for the detriment caused to them by their exclusion from the award procedure. By judgment of 5 November 2002 that action was dismissed as inadmissible since at the time they participated in the invitation to tender the applicants had failed to furnish the required proof of their registration in Belgium, and thus failed to submit a valid tender, and consequently had no legal interest in bringing an action for damages.

25. On 15 April 2003 BPC and WIG brought an appeal against the judgment of the Tribunal de première instance de Bruxelles before the Cour d'appel de Bruxelles (24) which, however, upheld the decision at first instance by judgment of 14 March 2007. (25) As grounds, the Cour d'appel pointed out that the applicants had not attached to the tender any proof that a registration application had been made by WIG and BPC-WIG. Although the certificates issued by the German tax and social security authorities in respect of WIG were also necessary for participation in the award procedure for other reasons, they could not have substituted for registration in Belgium, which was also necessary. Since the applicants had thus failed to satisfy an essential procedural requirement, their tender was invalid and that justified their immediate exclusion from the award procedure.

26. In consequence of an appeal on a point of law brought by BPC and WIG on 28 September 2007, the civil action is now pending before the Belgian Court of Cassation, the referring court. (26)

IV – Order for reference and procedure before the Court

27. By judgment of 22 January 2009, received at the Court on 18 February 2009, the Belgian Court of Cassation stayed its proceedings and referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Is the obligation to hold a registration in order to be awarded a public contract in Belgium, such as that imposed by Article 1.G of the special conditions applicable in the present case, contrary to the principle of freedom of movement within the European Union and to the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37/EEC, of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, if it had to be interpreted as permitting the Belgian contracting authority to exclude from the tender procedure a foreign contractor who does not hold a registration but has produced equivalent certificates from his national authorities?

(2) Is it contrary to the principle of freedom of movement within the European Union and to the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 to grant a Belgian contracting authority the power to require foreign tenderers to submit to a Belgian authority – the committee for the registration of contractors – for assessment of the validity of the certificates which have been issued to them by the tax and social security authorities of their State, attesting that they have fulfilled the obligations imposed on them relating to tax and social security?'

28. In the proceedings before the Court, in addition to BPC and WIG as the applicants and Berlaymont 2000 as the defendant in the main proceedings, the Kingdom of Belgium and the European Commission made written and oral observations. (27) The Czech Republic also took part in the written procedure.

V – Assessment

A – Admissibility of the request for a preliminary ruling

29. The Commission expresses doubts in two respects as to the admissibility of the request for a preliminary ruling, which Berlaymont 2000 shared at the hearing before the Court. Firstly, the order for reference does not contain the necessary information concerning the factual and legislative context of the dispute in the main proceedings, and, secondly, the Court of Cassation does not comment on the reasons which led it to make a reference to the Court.

30. According to case-law, if the Court is to be in a position to give helpful answers to the questions referred to it, it is necessary for the national court to define the factual and legislative context of the questions it asks or, at the very least, to explain the factual circumstances on which those questions are based. (28) Furthermore, it is essential that the national court should give at the very least some explanation of the reasons for the choice of the provisions of European law of which it requests an interpretation and on the link it establishes between those provisions and the national legislation applicable to the dispute.(29) In this context it should be borne in mind that the information provided in orders for reference must not only be such as to enable the Court to reply usefully but must also enable the governments of the Member States and other interested parties to submit observations pursuant to Article 23 of the Statute of the Court of Justice. (30)

31. The order for reference from the Belgian Court of Cassation is certainly not a textbook example of a request for a preliminary ruling. It lacks structure and a clear and complete account of the facts, the legal framework and the referring court's considerations on the relevance of its questions. Our Court's Information Note on references from national courts for a preliminary ruling (31) would appear to have been disregarded in the present case.

32. None the less, the deficiencies in the order for reference are not so serious as to render inadmissible the request for a preliminary ruling.

33. Firstly, as regards the factual and legislative context, although the Court of Cassation does not provide a specific account of the facts in the main proceedings and makes very few observations on the provisions of national and European law which it considers to be relevant, a reading of the order for reference shows what is at issue in the main proceedings and the context in which the questions have arisen. The relevant explanations are evident in particular from the lengthy section in which the Court of Cassation quotes verbatim from the grounds of the Cour d'appel judgment which is contested before it; if they are read with a degree of indulgence the most important elements of the factual and legislative context of the main proceedings can be reconstructed. The technique of referring to the judgment of the court below can probably be explained by the role of the Court of Cassation as a court of judicial review.

34. Furthermore, the parties to the main proceedings made additional comments in their written and oral statements which made it easier for the Court to understand the context in which the questions were referred. At the same time, the observations made by these parties show that the information in the order for reference enabled them themselves effectively to adopt a position on those questions. (32)

35. Secondly, as regards the relevance of the questions referred, although the referring court provides no separate information thereon, this deficiency does not warrant a declaration that the request for a preliminary ruling is admissible. In relation to questions which national courts refer to it for a preliminary ruling, the Court presumes, according to constant case-law, that they are relevant. (33) It considers that this presumption may be rebutted only in exceptional cases, where it is quite obvious that the interpretation which is sought of the provisions of Community law referred to in the questions bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or to its purpose; (34) therefore, in other words the lack of relevance must be obvious.

36. However, it cannot be concluded in the present case that the questions referred are obviously irrelevant to the resolution of the dispute in the main proceedings. On the contrary, this resolution depends crucially on the Court's answers to the questions. By their appeal on a point of law the applicants in the main proceedings allege that there has been an infringement of Directive 93/37 and Articles 49 and 50 EC. A glance at the passages of the Cour d'appel judgment cited in the order for reference shows that the entire national dispute revolves around the interpretation of those provisions of European Union law.

37. Finally, the Commission further alleges that the referring court made no observations on the applicability of Directive 93/37. However, in the case of construction work on a scale such as that covered by the Berlaymont contract, it seems obvious to me that the subject-matter in question falls within the scope of the provisions of European Union law on the award of public works contracts. Moreover, the parties to the proceedings agree on this point.

38. Altogether, I see no adequate grounds for declaring inadmissible the present request for a preliminary ruling.

B – Substantive assessment of the questions referred

39. The Belgian rules on the registration of contractors in force (35) at the time the Berlaymont contract was granted are to be considered in the light of European Union law in two respects. Firstly, it is asked whether it is compatible with Directive 93/37 and the 'principle of freedom of movement' for registration for tax purposes in national territory to be made a prerequisite also for foreign contractors taking part in award procedures. Secondly, the issue is whether it infringes the abovementioned provisions of European Union law to entrust examination of tax and social security certificates from other Member States to an authority other than the contracting authority.

40. The opinions of the parties to the proceedings are divided on these two issues: whilst the applicants in the main proceedings, the Czech Government and the Commission consider that provisions such as those at issue in this case are incompatible with the requirements of European Union law, the defendant in the main proceedings and the Belgian Government take the opposite view. However, in that respect the Belgian Government limits its observations to the second question referred. (36)

1. Compatibility of a registration requirement with European Union law (first question referred)

41. By its first question the referring court essentially seeks to ascertain whether a requirement relating to registration for tax purposes laid down in national law and the tendering conditions can be relied on also as against contractors from other Member States as a condition for their participation in procedures for the award of public contacts. The Court is requested to consider this question with regard to the 'principle of freedom of movement within the European Union' and to the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37.

42. In this case only the provisions on freedom to provide services (Article 59 and 60 of the EC Treaty) (37) are to be taken into account among the fundamental freedoms of the European single market.

43. However, it should be noted that, in a field which has been exhaustively harmonised at European Union level, a national measure must be assessed in the light of the provisions of that harmonising measure and not of those of primary law. (38) Although Directive 93/37 does not lay down comprehensive rules of European Union law in relation to public works contracts, but aims simply to coordinate national procedures for the award of such contracts, (39) the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 at issue in this case specifically contains, in connection with the contractors' professional quality, an exhaustive list of possible reasons why a participant may be excluded from the award procedure. (40)

44. Therefore, with regard to the professional qualitative criteria Directive 93/37 provides within its scope for exhaustive harmonisation. Consequently, the first question must be considered solely with regard to Directive 93/37, but its provisions must be interpreted and applied so as to render them consistent with the fundamental freedom to provide services which it serves to realise. (41)

45. It should first be noted that registration for tax purposes under the Royal Decree of 1978 should not be confused with registration in an official list of recognised contractors within the meaning of Article 29 of Directive 93/37. The parties to the proceedings agree that the registration requirement at issue in this case does not fall within the scope of Article 29. In any event, Article 29 would not be capable of justifying a mandatory registration requirement such as that in Belgium. The provision is merely intended to make it easier for foreign building contractors to take part in award procedures by providing for recognition of their registration in the lists of eligible contractors held in the relevant countries of origin. (42)

46. Nor is the fact that a contractor has failed to register for tax purposes in national territory included among the grounds for exclusion laid down expressly in the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37. (43)

47. However, it remains to be examined whether the registration procedure at issue in this case ultimately constitutes a procedure for the application of one of the exclusion criteria listed in the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37. It is conceivable that this registration serves officially to determine and certify the professional quality of contractors for the purposes of Article 24, in particular their reliability with regard to the payment of taxes and social security contributions in the Member States in which the service is provided (subparagraphs (e) and (f) of the first paragraph of Article 24). (44) Not least Article 2(1)(10) and (11) of the Royal Decree of 1978, which appears to refer to the fulfilment of tax and social security obligations in Belgium, militates in favour of this view. (45)

48. The request for a preliminary ruling is not, however, explicit as regards the subject-matter and purposes of the registration procedure and the observations by the parties to the proceedings before the Court do not give a clear picture in this regard. It will therefore be for the referring court, which alone has jurisdiction to interpret national law, (46) to make the necessary findings on the subject-matter and purposes of the registration procedure.

49. In the event that a registration procedure such as that provided for in the Royal Decree of 1978 does in fact prove to be a procedure to determine and certify the reliability of contractors, it is in principle consistent with the objectives of Directive 93/37, which include equal treatment of all tenderers (47) and establishment of the conditions for effective and undistorted competition amongst them. (48)

50. To precisely that end, the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 permits contractors who have not fulfilled obligations relating to the payment of social security contributions or taxes, or otherwise lack the professional quality to participate in the contract, in particular professional honesty, solvency and economic and financial capacity, to be excluded from participation in it. (49) Their exclusion is intended to prevent distortions of competition: it is necessary to avoid 'black sheep', who do not pay their taxes and social security contributions, for example, submitting, ultimately at the public's expense, more favourable tenders than their competitors and thus obtaining contracts by unfair methods, particular since those contracts are normally funded by taxes.

51. Article 24 of Directive 93/37 is, however, based on the idea that the reliability of tenderers can be assessed in the award procedure itself and there is no need for any preventative control in a separate procedure ahead of the award procedure. This provision expresses a fundamental value inherent in the freedom to provide services: A system of preventative control on contractors by a prior authorisation or registration procedure renders the provision of services less attractive and is justified only where subsequent control must be regarded as being too late to be genuinely effective and to enable it to achieve the aim pursued. (50)

52. Accordingly, registration of contractors can be made a prerequisite for their admission to award procedures only where it does not in fact prove to be a prior control and either complicate or delay the participation of the contractors in question in that award procedure, and where it does not impose additional administrative costs on them. (51)

53. It is for the referring court to examine whether or not the registration procedure provided for in Belgian law, which is at issue in this case, satisfies these requirements. According to the information before the Court, that procedure at least entails no additional administrative costs and merely requires the submission of documents which had to be available in any event under the first and second paragraphs of Article 24 of Directive 93/37. Furthermore, the registration procedure in the present case does not result in any loss of time since it was expressly provided that the mere submission of an application for registration was sufficient to submit a tender in the Berlaymont award procedure and no award would be made until the registration procedure had been concluded (see Article 1.G of the special conditions, as amended). (52)

54. Therefore, on closer examination the registration procedure in the present case does not necessarily constitute a preventative authorisation procedure prior to the award procedure. Instead, the assessment of the foreign contractors' reliability with regard to tax and social security contributions could be carried out in parallel with the award procedure, without entailing any additional time and costs. In these circumstances there are no fundamental doubts as to the compatibility of this registration procedure with Article 24 of Directive 93/37 and the values of the freedom to provide services which lie behind it.

55. Nor does anything to the contrary follow from the judgment in Commission v Belgium. (53) Although the infringement proceedings at that time had as their subject-matter provisions of Belgian law which also related to the registration of building contractors for tax purposes which is at issue in this case, in that case the Court did not examine the registration requirement per se in terms of its compatibility with European Union law, (54) but merely the substantial tax and social security disadvantages which Belgian law placed on building contractors and their contracting authorities for failure to register. (55) The present case does not raise such problems.

56. The Commission also objects that the assessment of a contractor as part of the registration procedure goes, in terms of its scope, beyond what is permitted under the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37. In that respect it refers to Article 2(1) of the Royal Decree of 1978, or more specifically to subparagraphs (7) and (12) thereof.

57. That objection is not convincing in my view. Although it is true that subparagraphs (7) and (12) of Article 2(1) of the Royal Decree of 1978 have no verbatim equivalent in the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, both provisions pursue the same objective as that underlying the first paragraph of Article 24, namely to determine the reliability of contractors.

58. For example, the first provision (Article 2(1)(7) of the Royal Decree of 1978) permits registration to be denied to companies whose management is prohibited from carrying on a commercial activity on account of a previous bankruptcy or criminal conviction. This provision has the same objective as subparagraphs (a) to (d) of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37: the aim is to ensure that only contractors whose solvency and professional honesty is not questionable on account of previous misdemeanours take part in award procedures. Naturally, that also means that the management of a company must provide a complete guarantee of professional honesty, otherwise it would be easy to circumvent the criterion relating to professional quality by founding a company.

59. The second provision (Article 2(1)(12) of the Royal Decree of 1978) permits registration to be denied to contractors who do not possess sufficient financial, administrative and technical resources to ensure fulfilment of their tax and social security obligations. Subparagraphs (e) and (f) of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 have no other purpose. Although the provisions of the directive deal, in terms of their wording, only with establishing any tax or social security negligence of a contractor in the past, subparagraphs (e) and (f) of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 seek, in terms of their sense and purpose, to make it possible to pursue precisely the objective sought by Article 2(1)(12) of the Royal Decree of 1978: the aim is to predict whether or not a participant in a procedure for the award of a public works contract can be expected to pay his taxes and social security contributions in accordance with his statutory obligations. If this question cannot be answered in the affirmative, it must be feared that there will be the abovementioned distortion of competition in the award procedure. (56)

60. Finally, some of the parties to the proceedings (57) submit that the examination to which a contractor is subject as part of the registration procedure goes beyond what is necessary and is therefore disproportionate. The Belgian authorities had to be content with certificates issued by the competent authorities of a contractor's country of origin, such as those produced by WIG in the present case.

61. This objection also falls short. Subparagraphs (e) and (f) of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 expressly permit controls on the reliability of a contractor with regard to the payment of tax and social security contributions, not only in respect of his country of origin but also in respect of the country of the contracting authority, that is to say the Member State in which the contractor would like to tender for a public works contract.

62. As the Czech Government points out, the implication is that contractors can operate as service providers in several Member States. Accordingly, the same contractor may have failed to fulfil his tax or social security obligations in several Member States, and not only in his country of origin. Therefore, the mere submission of clearance certificates from his country of origin does not permit any definitive conclusion to be reached as to his reliability with regard to the payment of tax and social security contributions. The Commission also acknowledged this fact at the hearing.

63. Consequently, it must be possible for the authorities in the country of the contracting authority to subject contractors to a separate examination for fulfilment of obligations in relation to tax and social security contributions in national territory. Accordingly, the second indent of the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 – unlike the first indent – permits not only the examination of certificates from the country of origin, but also the examination generally of certificates 'issued by the competent authority in the Member State concerned'.

64. To summarise, therefore:

The freedom to provide services and Directive 93/37 do not preclude a requirement, laid down in national law or tender conditions, relating to the registration for tax purposes of contractors from other Member States as a condition for their participation in a procedure for the award of public contracts, provided that the registration procedure – does not complicate or delay the participation of those contractors in an award procedure and does not impose additional administrative costs on them, and

– is limited, in terms of its subject-matter, to establishing and certifying the professional quality and reliability of those contractors for the purpose of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37.

2. Compatibility with European Union law of the examination of foreign proof by an authority other than the contracting authority (second question referred)

65. By its second question the referring court essentially seeks to ascertain whether foreign contractors can be obliged, as a condition for their participation in an award procedure, to submit certificates issued by the authorities of their country of origin attesting to the due payment of taxes and social security contributions to an authority other than the contracting authority – in the present case the registration committee – for an assessment of their validity. The Court is again asked to examine this question having regard to the 'principle of freedom of movement within the European Union' and to the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37.

66. As mentioned above, (58) the answer to this question turns solely on Directive 93/37, which, however, must for its part be interpreted and applied solely in the light of the principles relating to the freedom to provide services.

67. On closer inspection, the question gives rise to two problems which I will consider in turn. First, it is necessary to establish whether examination of certificates within the meaning of the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 may be given over to an authority other than the contracting authority (see section (a) immediately below). Secondly, it is necessary to determine to what this examination may extend (see section (b) below).

(a) The possibility of giving the examination of certificates over to an authority other than the contracting authority

68. In the provisions of Directive 93/37 on the qualitative criteria it is assumed a matter of course that the examination thereof will be carried by the contracting authority itself. For example, the second paragraph of Article 24 of the directive refers to the proof that the contracting authority can require from the contractor and a similar wording is used in related provisions such as Article 26(2) and (3) and Article 27(2). Furthermore, under Article 28 of the directive the contracting authority may invite the contractor to supplement the certificates and documents submitted or to clarify them.

69. However, none of this rules out the possibility of national provisions giving the examination of certain qualitative criteria over to a specialised authority at national, regional or local level or of the contracting authority calling in such an authority in a particular case on its own initiative. This may be appropriate not only where it is necessary to assess particularly complex questions concerning the financial and economic standing and technical capacity of a contractor in relation to a particular public contract (Articles 26 and 27 of Directive 93/37) but also where, for example, the burden on contracting authorities can be eased by the centralised examination of contractors' professional quality (Article 24 of Directive 93/37).

70. Bodies such as the Belgian registration committees are such specialised authorities. They examine centrally the professional quality of contractors who may wish to participate in award procedures. They can thus relieve the burden on the contracting authority and also ensure a certain uniformity in the assessment of contractors.

71. However, where specialised authorities such as registration committees deal with the examination of the professional quality of contractors with regard to their participation in award procedures, there must be an assurance that the contractors concerned are not disadvantaged as a result.

– On the one hand, this means that contractors may not have their participation in an award procedure complicated or delayed and that they may not be burdened with additional administrative costs. (59)

– On the other, the specialised authority itself must provide a guarantee that it will examine the contractors' qualification in conformity with the requirements of the relevant procurement directives and the principles relating to freedom to provide services which lie behind them.

72. As regards the first point, although in the present case the registration committee was not given a time-limit to rule on an application for registration, the conditions relating to the Berlaymont invitation to tender did ensure that the undertakings concerned would not be disadvantaged as a result: as mentioned above, mere proof that registration had been applied for was sufficient for the submission of a tender and Berlaymont 2000 had, as the contracting authority, undertaken not to award the contract before the registration procedure had been concluded (Article 1.G of the special conditions, as amended). (60)

73. However, the second point, that is to say guaranteeing the registration committee's compliance with the requirements of European Union law, is more problematic.

74. In this connection the Commission rightly pointed to the rules on the composition of the Belgian registration committees. The majority of the members are appointed at the proposal of the employers and employees of the local construction industry at the level of a Belgian province (Article 16(1) of the Royal Decree of 1978). Although a member appointed by the State chairs the registration committee (Article 16(2) of the decree), there is no assurance that the member appointed by the State will be able to prevent decisions contrary to European Union law by exercising a right of veto, for example.

75. Even if it is assumed that their respective members have the best of intentions, this composition and working method of the registration committees gives an appearance of partiality. (61) Foreign undertakings faced with the requirement of having their qualification assessed and determined by representatives of their potential competitors and their employees could be seriously deterred from taking part in procedures for the award of public works contracts in Belgium.

76. Contrary to the view of the Belgian Government, this appearance of partiality cannot be dispelled solely by the fact that the registration committees' decisions are reasoned and may be challenged in the courts. If a foreign contractor requires registration to take part in a particular award procedure, as WIG and BPC-WIG did in relation to the Berlaymont contract, he cannot be expected to go to court to obtain such registration with the considerable time and costs that that entails. In any event, a judgment granting the remedy sought would normally come too late to enable the contractor to take part in the award procedure.

77. Therefore, overall the registration committees do not provide, by their composition and working method as provided for in the Royal Decree of 1978, a sufficient guarantee of compliance with the requirements of European Union law. The determination of the professional qualification of contractors from other Member States pursuant to Article 24 of Directive 93/37 with regard to their participation in award procedures cannot be given over to such authorities.

(b) Scope of the examination of certificates from the country of origin

78. It is still necessary to consider what scope the examination of tax and social security clearance certificates issued in the country of origin, such as those produced by WIG in the present case, may have. In the wording of its question the referring court speaks of the registration committees assessing the 'validity' of foreign certificates without, however, specifying precisely what is meant by that.

79. The parties to the proceedings disagree as to the precise extent of the Belgian registration committees' powers of assessment. Whilst Berlaymont 2000 considers that these powers are consistent with Directive 93/37, the Commission considers that they are clearly more extensive than Directive 93/37 allows. In this respect the Commission points to Article 10(2) of the Royal Decree of 1978, under which the registration committee may require the applicant to provide further documents or information which it deems necessary to determine whether or not the conditions for registration have been fulfilled.

80. In this respect it should be noted that the powers of a public authority entrusted with the assessment of contractors' professional qualifications with regard to their participation in award procedures must be interpreted and applied so as to render them consistent with the requirements of European Union law. Under Article 28 of Directive 93/37, a contractor may be invited to supplement the certificates and documents submitted or to clarify them only 'within the limits of Articles 24 to 27'. In so far as national law is to allow Belgian registration committees to require from the contractor information and documents which are not provided for in Directive 93/37, no use may be made of such a power as against a contractor from another Member State.(62)

81. Under the second indent of the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37, the contracting authority (or other authority to which assessment of professional qualification may have been given over) is also to 'accept as sufficient evidence' of a contractor's reliability with regard to the payment of taxes and social security contributions a certificate issued by the competent authority in the Member State concerned.

82. The stringent wording 'accept as sufficient evidence' indicates that there is to be no specific margin of discretion where such a certificate is submitted to the contracting authority in the Member State in which the award procedure is being conducted. Consequently, the contracting authority or other authority entrusted with the assessment is barred from carrying out substantive checks on the accuracy of what the authority of the country of origin is certifying.

83. This is confirmed when one looks at the values relating to the freedom to provide services underlying Directive 93/37 which, as is known, must be taken into account in interpreting and applying this directive. It is incompatible in principle with the freedom to provide services to make a provider subject to restrictions for safeguarding the public interest in so far as that interest is already safeguarded by the rules to which the provider is subject in the Member State where he is established. (63) The authorities of the country of origin have examined whether a contractor has duly paid his taxes and social security contributions in his country of origin when they issue their certificate; accordingly, the freedom to provide services, which Article 24 of Directive 93/37 serves to implement, prohibits the same issue – that is to say reliability in terms of tax and social security contributions in the country of origin – from being re-examined substantively by the authorities of the host Member State.

84. Ultimately, therefore, the contracting authority or authority entrusted with the determination of contractors' reliability, must restrict itself to examining whether a certificate originating from the country of origin is in date, whether it is genuine, and whether or not it was issued by an authority which is clearly not competent to do so. More than such a summary examination may not be carried out because the authorities of the host Member State are not entitled to assess detailed matters concerning competence or the procedure for issuing such certificates in the contractor's country of origin.

85. Naturally, this does not effect the power of the authorities of the host Member State to examine whether the relevant contractor has met in their country – the Member State in which the service is to be provided – his obligations relating to the payment of taxes and social security contributions, and to predict whether he can also meet these obligations in relation to forthcoming public contracts.

86. To summarise:

The second indent of the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 does not prohibit foreign contractors from being required, as a condition for their participation in an award procedure, to submit certificates concerning the due payment of taxes and social security contributions issued by the authorities of their country of origin to an authority other than the contracting authority for examination, provided that that authority

– offers, in terms of its composition and working method, a sufficient guarantee of compliance with the requirements of European Union law, and

– restricts itself, in a summary examination, to ensuring that the relevant certificate is in date, that it is genuine, and that it was not issued by an authority which is clearly not competent to do so.

In so far as national law allows this authority to require from the contractor information and documents which are not provided for in Directive 93/37, no use may be made of such a power as against a contractor from another Member State.

VI – Conclusion

87. On the basis of the above considerations, I propose that the Court should answer the questions referred by the Belgian Cour de cassation as follows:

(1) The freedom to provide services and Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts do not preclude a requirement, laid down in national law or tender conditions, relating to the registration for tax purposes of contractors from other Member States as a condition for their participation in a procedure for the award of public contracts, provided that the registration procedure

– does not complicate or delay the participation of those contractors in an award procedure and does not impose additional administrative costs on them, and

– is limited, in terms of its subject-matter, to establishing and certifying the professional quality and reliability of those contractors for the purpose of the first paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37.

(2) The second indent of the second paragraph of Article 24 of Directive 93/37 does not prohibit foreign contractors from being required, as a condition for their participation in an award procedure, to submit certificates concerning the due payment of taxes and social security contributions issued by the authorities of their country of origin to an authority other than the contracting authority for examination, provided that that authority

– offers, in terms of its composition and working method, a sufficient guarantee of compliance with the requirements of European Union law, and

– restricts itself, in a summary examination, to ensuring that the relevant certificate is in date, that it is genuine, and that it was not issued by an authority which is clearly not competent to do so.

In so far as national law allows this authority to require from the contractor information and documents which are not provided for in Directive 93/37, no use may be made of such a power as against a contractor from another Member State.

41 – The Court has consistently held that the provisions of European law concerning public procurement serve, inter alia, to realise freedom to provide services (see Case C-44/96 Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others [1998] ECR I-73, paragraph 43; Michaniki, cited in footnote 39, paragraph 39; and Case C-480/06 Commission v Germany [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 47); it has also consistently held that the provisions of secondary law must be interpreted and applied so as to render them consistent with primary law (see Case 218/82 Commission v Council [1983] ECR 4063, paragraph 15; Case C-305/05 Ordre des barreaux francophones et germanophone and Others [2007] ECR I-5305, paragraph 28; and Joined Cases C-402/07 and C-432/07 Sturgeon and Others [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 48).

45 – The wording of Article 2(1)(11) of the Royal Decree of 1978, where reference is made to the contributions to be levied by the (Belgian) National Social Security Office and the contributions to the (Belgian) Subsistence Protection Fund, is particularly significant in this regard. rend le présent

Arrêt

1 Par sa requête, la Commission des Communautés européennes demande à la Cour de constater que la République fédérale d'Allemagne a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu de l'article 8 et des titres III à VI de la directive 92/50/CEE du Conseil, du 18 juin 1992, portant coordination des procédures de passation des marchés publics de services (JO L 209, p. 1), au motif que la municipalité de Bonn et Müllverwertungsanlage Bonn GmbH (ci-après «MVA») ont passé un marché public de services relatif à l'élimination de biodéchets et de déchets verts sans recourir à une procédure de passation avec appel d'offres européen.

2 L'article 1^er^, sous a), de la directive 92/50 énonce:

«les 'marchés publics de services' sont des contrats à titre onéreux, conclus par écrit entre un prestataire de services et un pouvoir adjudicateur […]»

3 L'article 8 de cette directive dispose:

4 L'article 15, paragraphe 2, de ladite directive prévoit:

«Les pouvoirs adjudicateurs désireux de passer un marché public de services en recourant à une procédure ouverte, restreinte ou, dans les conditions prévues à l'article 11, à une procédure négociée font connaître leur intention au moyen d'un avis.»

5 L'annexe I A de la directive 92/50, intitulée «Services au sens de l'article 8», comporte notamment la catégorie 16, dénommée «Services de voirie et d'enlèvement des ordures: services d'assainissement et services analogues», à laquelle correspond le numéro de référence CPC 94.

Les faits et la procédure précontentieuse

6 Le 26 mars 1997, la municipalité de Bonn et MVA, société municipale dont le capital est détenu par la municipalité de Bonn, ont conclu avec l'entreprise privée d'élimination de déchets EVB Entsorgung und Verwertung Bonn GmbH & Co. KG (ci-après «EVB») un contrat portant sur des services d'élimination de déchets. Par ce contrat, EVB s'engage, d'une part, à rassembler des ordures ménagères et à effectuer leur tri préalable, avant de les livrer, en vue de leur élimination, à MVA. EVB verse une somme fixe à MVA pour l'élimination des ordures ménagères qu'elle lui livre. D'autre part, EVB s'engage à traiter jusqu'à 15 000 Mg/an de biodéchets et jusqu'à 10 000 Mg/an de déchets verts provenant de l'agglomération de Bonn dans ses centres de compostage. Pour le traitement des biodéchets et des déchets verts, la municipalité verse quant à elle à EVB un montant fixe de 290 DEM/Mg pour les biodéchets et de 160 DEM/Mg pour les déchets verts. Ces montants sont soumis à une clause d'adaptation.

7 Par lettre de mise en demeure du 23 mars 2007 et conformément à la procédure prévue à l'article 226 CE, la Commission a fait valoir à la République fédérale d'Allemagne que la conclusion du contrat du 26 mars 1997 sans procédure de passation de marché avec appel d'offres européen pourrait avoir enfreint l'article 8 de la directive 92/50, en liaison avec les titres III à VI de celle-ci.

8 La République fédérale d'Allemagne a répondu à cette mise en demeure par lettre du 18 juillet 2007. Cette réponse a conduit la Commission à adresser, le 1er février 2008, un avis motivé à cet État membre, par lequel elle l'a invité à mettre un terme à l'infraction alléguée. La République fédérale d'Allemagne a répondu à cet avis motivé par lettre du 1er avril 2008, indiquant que des négociations étaient en cours entre la municipalité de Bonn et le nouveau propriétaire de MVA et que ces négociations pourraient déboucher sur un résultat sur la base duquel la procédure d'infraction pourrait être close.

9 N'étant pas satisfaite de cette réponse, la Commission a introduit le présent recours.

Sur le recours

10 La Commission soutient en substance que le contrat à titre onéreux conclu par écrit entre, d'une part, la municipalité de Bonn et MVA, en qualité de pouvoirs adjudicateurs et, d'autre part, l'entreprise privée EVB portant sur l'élimination de biodéchets et de déchets verts par celle-ci est un marché public de services qui ne pouvait être passé sans recourir à une procédure de passation avec appel d'offres européen.

11 La République fédérale d'Allemagne fait valoir qu'elle s'engage à trouver avec l'ensemble des parties au contrat litigieux une solution pour l'invalidation de celui-ci.

12 Elle soutient par ailleurs que l'articulation entre le droit des marchés publics et le droit des déchets est problématique et que l'application du droit des marchés publics ne doit pas conduire à une utilisation des capacités d'élimination trop inefficace et préjudiciable d'un point de vue écologique. Notamment, le droit des marchés publics ferait obstacle à ce que le traitement et l'élimination des déchets aient lieu aussi près que possible du lieu de leur production.

13 La République fédérale d'Allemagne soutient également que la plainte à la suite de laquelle la Commission est intervenue a été introduite dix ans après la mise en œuvre du contrat litigieux alors même que le plaignant avait eu connaissance, bien avant, de ce contrat et des irrégularités commises au cours de sa passation et qu'il a volontairement omis d'utiliser la voie d'une procédure nationale de recours. Si un manquement de la République fédérale d'Allemagne était constaté après une aussi longue période, un concurrent aurait alors la possibilité de contourner, dans le cadre de la procédure nationale de recours, les délais résultant notamment de la directive 89/665/CEE du Conseil, du 21 décembre 1989, portant coordination des dispositions législatives, réglementaires et administratives relatives à l'application des procédures de recours en matière de passation des marchés publics de fournitures et de travaux (JO L 395, p. 33), et destinés à assurer la sécurité juridique, et il pourrait ainsi faire échec à un besoin légitime des parties.

14 D'emblée, il convient de relever que la République fédérale d'Allemagne reconnaît qu'elle s'engage à trouver avec l'ensemble des parties au contrat litigieux une solution pour son invalidation et ne conteste pas au fond le manquement.

15 L'argument en défense tiré de ce que le droit des marchés publics irait à l'encontre de certains principes régissant le droit des déchets ne saurait prospérer.

16 Il est certes vrai que, ainsi que l'a rappelé la Cour dans son arrêt du 9 juillet 1992, Commission/Belgique (C-2/90, Rec. p. I-4431, point 34), la particularité des déchets et le principe de la correction, par priorité à la source, des atteintes à l'environnement impliquent qu'il appartient à chaque région, commune ou autre entité locale de prendre les mesures appropriées afin d'assurer la réception, le traitement et l'élimination de ses propres déchets, et que ceux-ci doivent donc être éliminés aussi près que possible du lieu de leur production, en vue de limiter leur transport autant que faire se peut.

19 S'agissant du second argument en défense soulevé par la République fédérale d'Allemagne, il convient de rappeler que, selon une jurisprudence constante, dans le cadre de l'exercice des compétences qu'elle tient de l'article 226 CE, la Commission, dans l'intérêt général communautaire, a pour mission de veiller d'office à l'application, par les États membres, du traité CE et des dispositions prises par les institutions en vertu de celui-ci et de faire constater, en vue de leur cessation, l'existence de manquements éventuels aux obligations qui en dérivent (arrêt du 4 avril 1974, Commission/France, 167/73, Rec. p. 359, point 15).

21 Ce principe vaut également en matière de marchés publics dans une situation dans laquelle sont en cause des contrats à l'encontre desquels il n'est plus possible de former un recours contentieux en raison de l'expiration des délais de recours.

22 Il est vrai que la Cour a jugé que la fixation de délais de recours raisonnables à peine de forclusion satisfait, en principe, à l'exigence d'effectivité découlant de la directive 89/665, dans la mesure où elle constitue une application du principe fondamental de sécurité juridique (arrêt du 12 décembre 2002, Universale-Bau e.a., C-470/99, Rec. p. I-11617, point 76), et que la directive 89/665 ne s'oppose par suite pas à une réglementation nationale qui prévoit que tout recours contre une décision du pouvoir adjudicateur doit être formé dans un délai prévu à cet effet et que toute irrégularité de la procédure d'adjudication invoquée à l'appui de ce recours doit être soulevée dans le même délai, sous peine de forclusion, de sorte que, passé ce délai, il n'est plus possible de contester une telle décision ou de soulever une telle irrégularité, pour autant que le délai en question soit raisonnable (arrêt Universale-Bau e.a., précité, point 79).

23 La République fédérale d'Allemagne ne saurait toutefois en déduire que le fait, pour la Commission, d'engager une procédure en constatation de manquement en raison d'un contrat à l'encontre duquel il n'est plus possible de former un recours contentieux serait contraire au principe de sécurité juridique.

24 La Cour a ainsi jugé que l'article 2, paragraphe 6, de la directive 89/665 ne saurait avoir d'incidence sur un recours exercé au titre de l'article 226 CE ou de l'article 228 CE (voir arrêt du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne, C-503/04, Rec. p. I-6153, point 34) et que cette conclusion vaut également pour la directive 89/665 envisagée dans son ensemble (arrêt du 15 octobre 2009, Commission/Allemagne, C-275/08, point 33).

25 Eu égard à son économie, ladite directive ne saurait être considérée comme réglant également la relation entre un État membre et la Communauté européenne, relation dont il s'agit dans le contexte de l'article 226 CE (arrêt du 15 octobre 2009, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 35).

26 En effet, les procédures de recours nationales, au sens de la directive 89/665, et le recours en manquement, au titre de l'article 226 CE, divergent tant par les parties au litige que par leur finalité, la procédure de recours nationale servant à protéger les intérêts des soumissionnaires écartés, tandis que la procédure en manquement assure le respect du droit communautaire dans l'intérêt général (arrêt du 15 octobre 2009, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 36).

29 En effet, ainsi qu'il ressort des points 19 et 20 du présent arrêt, c'est à la seule Commission qu'il appartient, dans l'intérêt général, de décider d'agir sur le fondement de l'article 226 CE (arrêt du 15 octobre 2009, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 39).

30 Eu égard à l'ensemble des considérations qui précèdent, il y a lieu de constater que la République fédérale d'Allemagne a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu de l'article 8 et des titres III à VI de la directive 92/50 au motif que la municipalité de Bonn et MVA ont passé un marché public de services relatif à l'élimination de biodéchets et de déchets verts sans recourir à une procédure de passation avec appel d'offres européen.

Sur les dépens

31 Aux termes de l'article 69, paragraphe 2, du règlement de procédure, toute partie qui succombe est condamnée aux dépens, s'il est conclu en ce sens. La Commission ayant conclu à la condamnation de la

République fédérale d'Allemagne et celle-ci ayant succombé en ses moyens, il y a lieu de la condamner aux dépens.

Par ces motifs, la Cour (quatrième chambre) déclare et arrête:

1) La République fédérale d'Allemagne a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu de l'article 8 et des titres III à VI de la directive 92/50/CEE du Conseil, du 18 juin 1992, portant coordination des procédures de passation des marchés publics de services, au motif que la municipalité de Bonn et Müllverwertungsanlage Bonn GmbH ont passé un marché public de services relatif à l'élimination de biodéchets et de déchets verts sans recourir à une procédure de passation avec appel d'offres européen.

2) La République fédérale d'Allemagne est condamnée aux dépens.

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 1 June 2010,

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 2(8) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33), as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1) ('Directive 89/665').

2 The reference has been made in proceedings between the Simvoulio Apokhetefseon Lefkosias (Nicosia Sewage Council) (‘the Simvoulio’), a legal body governed by public law acting as contracting authority, and the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon (Tenders Review Authority), an administrative body which examines appeals brought against decisions taken by the contracting authorities in procurement matters, concerning the right of the Simvoulio to appeal to a judicial body against a decision adopted by the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon.

Legal context

European Union legislation

3 In the first recital in the preamble to Directive 89/665, it is stated that the directives on public procurement do not contain any specific provisions ensuring their effective application.

4 According to the third recital in the preamble to that directive:

‘… the opening-up of public procurement to Community competition necessitates a substantial increase in the guarantees of transparency and non-discrimination; … for it to have tangible effects, effective and rapid remedies must be available in the case of infringements of Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law’.

5 The fourth recital in the preamble to that directive states:

‘… in certain Member States the absence of effective remedies or inadequacy of existing remedies deter Community undertakings from submitting tenders in the Member State in which the contracting authority is established; … therefore, the Member States concerned must remedy this situation’.

6 The seventh recital in the preamble to that directive is worded as follows:

‘… when undertakings do not seek review, certain infringements may not be corrected unless a specific mechanism is put in place’.

7 The eighth recital in the preamble to Directive 89/665 states:

‘… accordingly, the Commission, when it considers that a clear and manifest infringement has been committed during a contract award procedure, should be able to bring it to the attention of the competent authorities of the Member State and of the contracting authority concerned so that appropriate steps are taken for the rapid correction of any alleged infringement’.

8 Article 1 of that directive provides:

‘1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles, and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works [or service] contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.’

9 Article 2(7) and the first subparagraph of Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 are worded as follows:

‘7. The Member States shall ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

8. Where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article [267 TFEU] and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body.’

10 Article 3 of that directive provides that the Commission has a power to intervene when, prior to a contract being concluded, it considers that, during a public contract award procedure, a clear and manifest infringement of relevant European Union provisions has been committed.

National legislation

11 Article 146(1) of the Constitution of Cyprus (‘the Constitution’) grants the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias (Supreme Court of the Republic of Cyprus) exclusive jurisdiction to review the lawfulness of the decisions or omissions of the administration.

12 Article 146(2) of the Constitution provides:

‘The request for judicial review may be made by any person whose existing legitimate interests, as an individual or as a member of a community, are adversely and directly affected by the decision, act or omission.’

13 Law No 101 (I)/2003 on the award of contracts (supply, works and services) seeks to ensure the compatibility of the Cypriot legislation with the relevant European Union legislation, including Directive 89/665. Article 60 of that law, as amended by Law No 181 (I)/2004, provides:

‘Interested parties who believe that they have been wronged by the decision of the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon shall be entitled to seek a review by the Anotato Dikastirio [tis Kipriakis Dimokratias] in accordance with Article 146 of the Constitution. The contracting authority shall also be entitled to seek a review by the Anotato Dikastirio pursuant to Article 146 of the Constitution where, on the basis of adequate documentary evidence, the decision of the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon can be regarded as unfair to the aforementioned authority.’

The dispute in the main proceedings and the question referred for a preliminary ruling

14 The Simvoulio acts as a contracting authority in the context of award procedures for public contracts, within the meaning of Law No 101 (I)/2003.

15 The Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon was created in the context of ensuring the compatibility of Cypriot law with European Union legislation on public contracts and, in particular, with Directive 89/665. It is therefore a body responsible for review procedures within the meaning of Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665, is not judicial in character, and exercises its powers on the basis of the abovementioned law.

16 On 14 February 2006, following an action brought by an undertaking, the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon annulled the decision by which the Simvoulio had accepted the tender submitted by a competing undertaking. By an appeal brought before the competent chamber of the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias on 31 March 2006, the Simvoulio sought the annulment of the abovementioned decision of the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon.

17 During the proceedings, the plenary formation of the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias gave judgment on 17 December 2007 in the context of another case concerning public contracts, holding that Article 146 of the Constitution should be interpreted as meaning that it does not grant a legitimate interest to the contracting authorities to seek the review of an annulment decision adopted by the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon, and that Article 60 of Law No 101 (I)/2003 should be not be applied.

18 The view of the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias, which now constitutes settled case-law, is based on the consideration that the decision of the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon does not constitute a decision of the administration, independent of the proceedings in which the contracting authority concerned is itself involved. That decision does not therefore concern an interest evoked by the contracting authority, but the public interest in the lawful conduct of the general procedures governing public contracts. The contracting authority and the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon are, for the purposes of the proceedings in question, elements of the same administration, so that it is appropriate to apply the general principle that an administrative body cannot claim a legitimate interest against another body of the same administration and, in essence, bring proceedings against it.

19 The chamber of the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias, before which the main proceedings were brought by the Simvoulio, observes that the abovementioned view of the plenary formation of that court was adopted solely on the basis of Article 146 of the Constitution, without the question of the application and interpretation of European Union law having been raised.

20 However, that chamber notes that Article 60 of Law No 101 (I)/2003, which transposes into national law the European Union legislation on public contracts, applies independently of the interpretation of Article 146 of the Constitution, which must consequently be interpreted consistently with European Union law. In light of the fact that an interpretation of the first subparagraph of Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 for the purposes of answering the question raised in the main proceedings has not yet been the subject of the Court's case-law, the chamber considers that it is essential, in order to ensure uniform interpretation and application of European Union law, to make a reference to the Court for a preliminary ruling.

21 That chamber also points out that, in accordance with the Court's case-law, the existence of the abovementioned decision of the plenary formation of the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias does not prevent it from exercising a discretionary power to assess the need to make a reference to the Court for a preliminary ruling (Case 166/73 Rheinmühlen Düsseldorf [1974] ECR 33, paragraph 4).

22 In the light of those considerations, the chamber of the Anotato Dikastirio tis Kipriakis Dimokratias seised of the main proceedings decided to stay proceedings and refer the following question to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'Does Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 … recognise contracting authorities as having a right to judicial review of cancellation decisions by bodies responsible for review procedures which are not judicial bodies?'

Consideration of the question referred for a preliminary ruling

23 By its question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as meaning that it requires the Member States to provide, also for contracting authorities, a right to seek judicial review of the decisions of non-judicial bodies responsible for review procedures concerning the award of public contracts.

24 In the light of a – first of all – literal examination of the provisions of Directive 89/665, it should, for the purposes of answering that question, be noted, first, that, in the fourth and seventh recitals in the preamble to that directive, 'Community undertakings' are explicitly referred to as parties for the purposes of seeking a review of the procedures for the award of public contracts.

25 It should be noted, secondly, that Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665, which states that review procedures are available 'at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a public contract', defines the class of persons which must be allowed a right of review on the basis of that directive.

26 Thirdly, it should be noted, in support of the considerations in paragraph 25 of this judgment, that, as is apparent from the seventh recital in the preamble to Directive 89/665, the European Union legislature was aware of the possibility that certain infringements may not be corrected when undertakings do not seek review of unlawful or erroneous decisions, it being understood that such decisions might also be adopted by bodies responsible for the review procedures that were not judicial bodies. However, in order to remedy such a situation, Article 3 of Directive 89/665 provides for the Commission to have a general power to intervene in accordance with the procedure established in that provision.

27 Therefore, the wording of the provisions of Directive 89/665 does not suggest that the European Union legislature intended the contracting authorities to be regarded as parties for the purposes of seeking a review in the context of the procedures for awarding public contracts. Article 2(8) of that directive must, therefore, be considered as constituting a specific requirement, including specific guarantees, imposed on the Member States where the authorities responsible for review procedures are not judicial bodies and it does not amend the class of persons who have a right of review on the basis of that directive.

28 That finding is confirmed by the objective of Directive 89/665.

29 The first and third recitals in the preamble to that directive set out the directive's objective, upon its adoption, by reference to the objective of the directives containing substantive provisions on public contracts. Since the objective of the latter directives is the opening-up of public contracts to competition within the European Union under conditions of transparency and non-discrimination, and those directives do not contain specific provisions allowing their effective application to be guaranteed, Directive 89/665 fulfils that role by requiring the Member States to establish effective and rapid review procedures.

30 Therefore, the rationale of Directive 89/665 is to allow, by the establishment of appropriate review procedures, the effective application of the substantive provisions of European Union law on public contracts, which seek to ensure, for traders established in the Member States, the opening-up to competition which is undistorted and as wide as possible (see, to that effect, Case C-337/06 Bayerischer Rundfunk and Others [2007] ECR I-11173, paragraphs 38 and 39 and case-law cited).

31 The considerations set out in paragraph 29 of this judgment are, moreover, supported by the provisions of Directive 2007/66/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 December 2007 amending Council Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC with regard to improving the effectiveness of review procedures concerning the award of public contracts (OJ 2007 L 335, p. 31). That directive, although not applicable ratione temporis to the facts of the main proceedings, nevertheless contains elements which are useful for the interpretation of the system established by Directive 89/665, in so far as it does not amend that system, but seeks, in the words of the third recital in the preamble thereto, to provide for that directive 'the essential clarifications which will allow the results intended by the Community legislature to be attained'.

32 Therefore, the 'tenderers concerned' and the 'economic operators' are referred to, in particular in the 4th, 6th, 7th, 14th and 27th recitals in the preamble to Directive 2007/66, as persons covered by the effective judicial protection intended by that directive and as parties who may bring review proceedings.

33 Furthermore, it should be noted that Article 1 of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 2007/66, is now entitled 'Scope and availability of review procedures', whereas Article 2 thereof is entitled 'Requirements for review procedures'. This therefore confirms the conclusion that the obligation imposed on the Member States under Article 2(8), now Article 2(9), of Directive 89/665, to provide for judicial review of decisions of bodies responsible for review procedures that are not judicial in character, constitutes a specific requirement of that directive and does not bring the contracting authorities within its scope of application.

34 In addition, Article 3 of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 2007/66, is now entitled 'Corrective mechanism' and confirms the Commission's general power to intervene in cases of serious infringements of European Union law.

35 It follows that Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 does not require Member States to provide a procedure for judicial review also for contracting authorities.

36 In the light, however, of the obligation imposed on the Member States by Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665 to ensure the right to review is available 'at least' to all the persons defined in that article, and in the light also of the procedural independence enjoyed by the Member States, it should be held that the Member States are not prevented from including contracting authorities within the class of persons to whom the review procedures within the meaning of the abovementioned provision are available, in cases where contracting authorities' decisions are annulled by non-judicial bodies.

37 The argument that such an interpretation would be likely to lead to a lack of uniformity in the application of European Union law cannot be accepted, in so far as Directive 89/665, as is apparent, in particular, from Article 1(3) thereof, does not seek to completely harmonise the relevant national legislation.

38 Consequently, the answer to the question referred is that Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as not requiring the Member States to provide, also for contracting authorities, a right to seek judicial review of the decisions of non-judicial bodies responsible for review procedures concerning the award of public contracts. However, that provision does not prevent the Member States from providing, in their legal systems, for such a legal remedy for contracting authorities.

Costs

39 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby rules:

Article 2(8) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992, must be interpreted as not requiring the Member States to provide, also for contracting authorities, a right to seek judicial review of the decisions of non-judicial bodies responsible for review procedures concerning the award of public contracts. However, that provision does not prevent the Member States from providing, in their legal systems, such a review procedure in favour of contracting authorities.

CRUZ VILLALÓN
delivered on 1 June 2010 1

Case C-570/08

Simvoulio Apokhetevseon Lefkosias
v
Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon

(Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Anotato Dikastirio Kiprou (Supreme Court of Cyprus))

(Public works and public supply contracts – Review procedures for awards – Interpretation of Article 2(8) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC – Right of the contracting authority to challenge before the courts the decisions of the body, not judicial in character, responsible for review procedures)

I – Introduction

1. The Anotato Dikastirio Kiprou (Supreme Court of Cyprus), acting as a court of first instance, (2) asks the Court of Justice whether it can be inferred from Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665/EEC (3) ('Directive 89/665' or 'the Directive') that the contracting authority for a public contract has a right to challenge before the courts the annulment of its decision by the administrative body responsible for the supervision of review procedures.

A – Directive 89/665

2. Pursuant to Article 1(1), 'Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles, and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.' (4)

3. Article 1(3) states:

'The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.'

4. Article 2(8) provides:

‘Where bodies responsible for review procedures are not judicial in character, written reasons for their decisions shall always be given. Furthermore, in such a case, provision must be made to guarantee procedures whereby any allegedly illegal measure taken by the review body or any alleged defect in the exercise of the powers conferred on it can be the subject of judicial review or review by another body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty and independent of both the contracting authority and the review body.

B – Cypriot law

5. Under Article 146.2 of the Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus, a request for judicial review of the acts or omissions of the Administration ‘may be made by any person whose existing legitimate interests, as an individual or as a member of a community, are adversely and directly affected by the decision, act or omission’.

6. Law No 101(I)/2003 on the Award of Contracts (supply, works and services), as amended by Law No 181(I)/2004, was enacted in order to bring Cypriot legislation into line with European Union law, including Directive 89/665 and, to that end, Article 55 created the Anatheoritiki Arkhi Prosforon (tenders review authority, ‘the review authority’) and Article 56 gave it jurisdiction to hear ‘hierarchical appeals’ against the decisions of contracting authorities. Article 60 of that law, as amended by Law No 181(I)/2004, provides: ‘Interested parties who believe that they have been wronged by the decision of the [the review authority] shall be entitled to seek a review by the Anotato Dikastirio in accordance with Article 146 of the Constitution. The contracting authority shall also be entitled to seek a review by the Anotato Dikastirio pursuant to Article 146 initially of the Constitution where, on the basis of adequate documentary evidence, the decision of the review authority can be regarded as unfair to the aforementioned authority.’

7. As will be seen, this provision has been the subject of a declaration by the Anotato Dikastirio which is particularly relevant to this case.

III – Background to the national proceedings and the question referred

8. In June 2003, the Simvoulio Apokhetevseon Levkosias (Nicosia sewerage board, ‘the Simvoulio’), (6) acting as a contracting authority, published a tender notice for the design, construction, operation and maintenance, for a period of 10 years, of a wastewater treatment plant in Anthoupolis.

9. Among the preselected tenderers were the Degremont SA & Atlas Pantou Co Ltd consortium (‘Degremont’) and the WTE BAMAG consortium.

10. The respective tenders having been submitted, the Simvoulio informed Degremont of its decision to award the contract to the WTE BAMAG consortium.

11. On 7 October 2005 Degremont appealed against that decision to the review authority, and sought an interim measure suspending the operation of the Simvoulio’s decision, given that the latter would entail the definitive award of the contract. The date of 13 October 2005 was set for the interim hearing but, as merely applying for the interim measure did not (at the time the events took place) give rise to any suspension of operation, the Simvoulio in fact awarded the contract to the WTE BAMAG consortium before the review authority gave its decision on the application for suspension.

12. On 14 February 2006, the review authority gave its decision in the substantive case, annulling the Simvoulio’s decision. (7)

13. WTE BAMAG did not bring legal proceedings challenging that decision before the Anotato Dikastirio. The Simvoulio, by contrast, did so (8) on 31 March 2006, relying on Article 146.2 of the Constitution and Article 60 of Law No 101(I) /2003 on the Award of Contracts for the purposes of locus standi.

14. While this case was still pending, the Anotato Dikastirio, sitting in full court, delivered its judgment of 10 December 2007 in another case (9) involving the same parties. In it, the Anotato Dikastirio rejected the argument that the Simvoulio, as a contracting authority, had a legitimate interest in calling for review of the annulment decision of the review authority because, in summary, (1) the latter decision forms part of a complex award procedure, (2) the review authority is a second-instance administrative body (of higher instance) in relation to the Simvoulio, for which reason one part of the administration cannot have a legitimate interest as against another part of the administration, (3) contracting authorities protect the public interest but have no interests of their own and, (4) Article 60 of Law No 101(I) /2003 cannot grant a right to review to the contracting authority if such a right is not recognised by Article 146.2 of the Constitution.

15. The Anotato Dikastirio (in case 629/2006), as court of first instance, mindful of the case-law laid down by the full court and in view of the fact that that case-law contained no analysis of the Cypriot legislation in the light of Directive 89/665, stayed the proceedings and referred the matter to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling in the following terms:

‘To what extent does Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665/EC recognise contracting authorities as having a right to judicial review of annulment decisions by bodies responsible for review procedures, when those bodies are not judicial in character?’

IV – The proceedings before the Court of Justice

16. The order for reference was lodged with the Court Registry on 22 December 2008.

17. The Simvoulio, the Czech Government and the Commission call for a positive response from the Court of Justice to the question referred by the Anotato Dikastirio, to the effect that Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 does recognise the right of contracting authorities to judicial review of decisions by bodies responsible for review procedures.

18. In the view of the review authority, Directive 89/665 provides protection for undertakings but not for contracting authorities, for they cannot be regarded as having separate interests for the purposes of taking judicial action against the bodies responsible for reviewing their decisions.

19. At the hearing on 25 March 2010, the representatives of the Simvoulio, the review authority and the Commission presented their oral submissions.

V – The substance of the case

20. The reference for a preliminary ruling from the Anotato Dikastirio raises the question, for the first time in the case-law of the Court of Justice, whether, on the basis of Directive 89/665, a contracting authority must have the right to contest the decisions of another public body charged with the review of that authority’s decisions, when, without prejudice to the public nature of both bodies, they have separate legal personalities, belong, in addition, to different branches of administration and, in terms of function, perform different tasks.

21. The answer to this question must be prefaced by some thoughts on the structure of the actions for review contemplated by Directive 89/665, before going on to analyse the scope of Article 2(8) of the Directive, which is relied on here.

22. As early as in the third recital in the preamble to the directive, it is pointed out that ‘the opening-up of public procurement to Community competition necessitates a substantial increase in the guarantees of transparency and non-discrimination; … for it to have tangible effects, effective and rapid remedies must be available in the case of infringements of Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law’, and this statement is consistent with the ‘substantive’ measures (10) coordinating public procurement procedures within the Community.

23. The Member States enjoy a wide discretion when it comes to implementing the review systems contained in the directive, which ‘lays down only the minimum conditions to be satisfied by the review procedures established in domestic law to ensure compliance with the requirements of Community law concerning public contracts'. (11)

24. That is why, to take but one example, the directive contains no provision specifically covering time-limits for the applications for review which it seeks to establish. (12)

25. In particular, and most significantly for our present purposes, with regard to the point made above, the directive ensures only that the review procedures provided for by the Directive are available 'at least' to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public contract and who has been, or risks being, harmed by an alleged infringement of the Community law concerning public contracts or of the national rules transposing that law. (13)

26. In any event, the European Union directive intended the final review of legality in the field of public procurement to rest with a judicial body, (14) either directly, where the first review body is a court or judge, or indirectly, where the courts have the power to hear and determine an action brought against the decision of any administrative review body which may have been created. The latter is the model used in Cyprus, where jurisdiction to hear actions contesting the acts of the administrative body created there (the review authority) is conferred on the Anotato Dikastirio (Supreme Court).

27. However, as soon as the Directive makes it possible for an intermediate body to be responsible for ruling on the merits of actions challenging decisions of the contracting authority, it obviously gives rise to the possibility that the raison d'être of judicial review, necessarily subsequent, may to a certain extent be altered. In such a case, in judicial review proceedings, what is reviewed is the correctness of the decision of the administrative body, whether upholding or annulling the award in question, at the request of whoever is entitled to call for review in each particular case.

28. This consideration demonstrates that the issue raised in this reference for a preliminary ruling would, by definition, not exist in those national legal systems which have not opted for administrative review bodies but have instead chosen judicial review as the direct and only route. In that situation, contracting authorities can only be defendants. By contrast, when judicial proceedings are taken against the annulment decision of an administrative review body, there is the possibility that, apart from the undertakings detrimentally affected by the annulment decision, contracting authorities may seek to appear as applicants.

29. That is why, in the present case, the Simvoulio, possibly in an attempt to prevent a potential claim for damages against it, seeks judicial review of the review authority's annulment of the award of the contract to a particular tenderer.

30. It is therefore necessary to examine whether, on the basis of this approach, the Simvoulio is entitled to the right of review it has claimed.

31. In my view, the locus standi of the contracting authority to bring an action before a judicial body to contest the act of an administrative review body annulling its decision is not required by Directive 89/665 and cannot be inferred from it.

32. First of all, the seventh and eighth recitals in the preamble, taken together, do not exactly militate in favour of construing access to of judicial review for contracting authorities as a requirement of the directive. Those recitals make express provision for review only for undertakings, and include the remark that when undertakings do not seek review, 'certain infringements may not be corrected'.

33. Secondly, by stating that it is necessary for the decisions of contracting authorities to be effectively reviewed, Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 specifically recognises that contracting authorities can be defendants, but it is not possible to infer from any other provision of the directive that they have any locus standi to bring an action.

34. Finally, this rather restrictive approach is confirmed by Article 1(3) of the directive, since the relevant review may be sought by 'at least', any person 'having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement', which would seem to at least leave open the possibility that contracting authorities are excluded. Furthermore, the provision does not appear to have contracting authorities in view, given that it authorises the Member States to introduce a duty on the person seeking the review to give prior notice to 'the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review'.

35. However, it is true to say that, by the time we reach Article 2(8), the language of the directive appears more open and, unlike in other parts of the directive, there is no express reference to tenderers (that is, to the person having an interest in obtaining a contract), which seemingly is the basis for the Simvoulio's argument that, as a contracting authority, it has a right to review.

36. The representative of the Simvoulio in fact claimed at the hearing that, comparing Article 1(3) with Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665, the two provisions are not contradictory. In his view, while the latter refers only to reviews sought before a judicial body (or a body which is judicial for the purposes of Article 267 TFEU), the former also contemplates the possibility of seeking review before a non-judicial body which is responsible in this respect, relating exclusively to the decision of the contracting authority. The reason is that it would be inconceivable for a contracting authority to seek review of its own decision, in contrast to the situation covered by Article 2(8).

37. However, this element of ambiguity in Article 2(8) of the Directive is not enough, in my view, to alter the foregoing considerations. Article 2(8) merely creates the possibility that an administrative body might, initially, be responsible for the review and, in any event, it introduces the requirement, in the terms already mentioned, that in these circumstances there must be a review of its decisions, either of a strictly judicial nature or before a body which is equivalent for the purposes of Article 267 TFEU to a judicial body, without specifying once again which persons have locus standi to seek such review.

38. Finally, it is necessary to dismiss the argument raised by the Simvoulio, and supported by the Commission, to the effect that if it is not accepted that the Simvoulio has capacity to bring proceedings, the opportunity to apply European Union law directly and uniformly could be blocked because the chance to refer a question for a preliminary ruling would be lost in situations, such as the present case, where no undertaking seeks judicial review of the decision.

39. On the one hand, the possible further opportunity to clarify European Union law cannot directly determine how the specific question of locus standi is to be settled, for this falls within the realm of the procedural autonomy of Member States. Moreover, it is to be expected that, in normal circumstances, when annulments appear to have no basis in law, it would be the tenderers which contested them, thereby creating an opportunity for a reference for a preliminary ruling.

40. In any event, by way of safeguard, Article 3 of the Directive itself provides the Commission with a 'specific mechanism' where it considers that a clear and manifest infringement has been committed during a contract award procedure. To that end, the provision authorises appropriate steps to be taken for the rapid correction of any alleged infringement.

41. The foregoing considerations lead me to conclude that Directive 89/665 makes no statement, either directly or indirectly, regarding the legal remedies which must be made available to contracting authorities. That should be sufficient, in my view, to give a negative response to the question raised by the Anotato Dikastirio. In my opinion, however, this conclusion should be supported by some further points.

42. At point 18 of its observations, the Simvoulio argues that being restricted in this way is seriously detrimental to it, inasmuch as, on the one hand, the contract would be awarded to a legal person other than the tenderer that it considers the most suitable, and as, on the other hand, it cannot rule out the possibility that it will face a claim for liability in respect of the losses incurred as a result of the award which was subsequently annulled by the review authority. Then, of course, there is the obvious fact that the Simvoulio is a public entity with its own administrative powers, specifically, to manage wastewater, (15) in which context it has the status of a contracting authority and is in a position which is at any rate different from that of the review authority. (16)

43. In this regard, and although the Court of Justice cannot rule on the position of the Simvoulio as an organ of the Cypriot system or on its relationship to the review authority, (17) the hearing provided sufficient clarification to find unconvincing the review authority's argument that the acts of both bodies form part of a single award procedure, and that on that basis they are not in reality separate bodies.

44. Against this, however, would be the logic behind the review described in Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665, as the claims of tenderers seeking to have the award revoked aside would be genuinely compromised if a certain amount of independence between the review body and the contracting authority were not accepted. This view is supported by Article 2(3) of Directive 2007/66, which, in connection with the review of a contract award decision, refers to 'a body of first instance, which is independent of the contracting authority'.

45. However, irrespective of the foregoing, the following point must be made. Having established that Directive 89/665 contains no reference to the effect that legal remedies may be available to contracting authorities, even against annulment decisions taken by an administrative review body, it is clear that the detrimental effects claimed by the Simvoulio, in so far as they can be substantiated, exist, in principle, only in the sphere of the procedural autonomy of Member States, and that it is in that context of the relevant national legal systems that they must be addressed.

46. Nevertheless, one final point should be made, which is that the procedural autonomy of the Member States is clearly not absolute. In fact, when that autonomy is exercised in the field of European Union law, it meets its furthest limits in the general principles of that law and, in particular here, both in the value that is the 'rule of law' (18) and in observance of fundamental rights, specifically the right to an effective remedy pursuant to Article 47 of the Charter. (19)

47. However, for the purposes of this case, suffice it to say, in this regard, that the nature of legal persons governed by public law possessed by such contracting authorities makes it very difficult for them to rely on Article 47 of the Charter (20) which, moreover, has not been expressly pleaded in these proceedings.

48. Finally, attempting to infer from the rule of law that the contracting authority has capacity to bring legal proceedings is even more problematic in the circumstances of the case. Of course, it is beyond doubt that a balanced procedural structure forms part of the image of the rule of law and, from that point of view, it might seem surprising that the contracting authority is denied access to judicial review of the annulment by the administrative body of its decision to award a contract.

49. However, in this respect, we must be mindful of the fact that, in the first place, it is primarily the tendering undertakings which were awarded the contract by the decision subsequently annulled that would naturally be inclined to seek judicial review of that annulment, in the exercise of a capacity to bring proceedings which has obviously never been in dispute.

50. Furthermore, we would do well to remember that, by virtue of Article 2(7) of Directive 89/665, the Member States 'shall ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced'. The provision makes no distinction between judicial and non-judicial bodies and consequently this mandate to optimise enforcement must not be interfered with more than is absolutely necessary by prolonging the dispute and the lack of legal certainty beyond what is envisaged in the directive.

51. The foregoing should be sufficient, in my opinion, to conclude that the restriction of the contracting authority's capacity to bring proceedings is, in the circumstances of the case, proportionate, viewed from a perspective as broad as the rule of law undoubtedly is. Nor, in conclusion, should it therefore be assumed from this last observation that the procedural autonomy exercised by the Member State within the context of Directive 89/665 was exercised in disregard of the general principles of European Union law or of the values or fundamental rights proclaimed therein.

VI – Conclusion

52. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court of Justice give the following reply to the question referred for a preliminary ruling:

Article 2(8) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts does not preclude an interpretation whereby a contracting authority is prevented from exercising the right to challenge before the courts the annulment of its decision by the administrative body responsible for review procedures.

12 – According to the judgments of the Court of Justice in Case C-470/99 Universale-Bau and others [2002] ECR I-11617, paragraph 71 and in Case C-406/08 Uniplex (UK) Ltd [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 26, '[i]t is therefore for the internal legal order of each Member State to establish such time-limits'.

13 – Order of the Court of Justice of 4 October 2007, cited, paragraph 20.

14 – A concept which, for these purposes, includes not only a judicial body recognised as such from the organisational perspective of the Member State, and whose protection is invoked by means of a 'judicial review', but also a 'body which is a court or tribunal within the meaning of Article 177 of the EEC Treaty … independent of both the contracting authority and the review body', since Article 2(8) of Directive 89/665 also permits the decisions of the contracting authority or administrative body responsible for review to be examined by such a body.

15 – In point of fact, the Simvoulio also represents the interest of the community in wastewater being correctly managed, a function for which it alone has full responsibility, as was confirmed at the hearing, and which covers wastewater distribution and treatment in the Nicosia metropolitan area, thus extending beyond the city limits.

16 – From the submissions of all those participating in these preliminary ruling proceedings it is clear that the Simvoulio is a 'contracting authority' and the review authority 'a non-judicial body responsible for the review procedure', and it is therefore only necessary to look to Directive 89/665 to conclude that the two administrative bodies, perform different roles, at least from a functional perspective.

17 – It is not for the Court of Justice to analyse national law because the mechanism for seeking preliminary rulings is based on a clear separation of functions between the national courts and the Court of Justice, which is empowered only to rule on the interpretation or, as the case may be, the validity of European Union provisions on the basis of the facts which the national court puts before it: see the judgments of the Court of Justice in Case C-30/93 AC-ATEL Electronics Vertriebs [1994] ECR I-2305, paragraph 16; Case C-352/95 Phytheron International [1997] ECR I-1729, paragraph 11; and Case C-235/95 Dumon and Froment [1998] ECR I-4531, paragraphs 25 to 27.

18 – Article 2 TEU treats 'the rule of law' as a 'value' common to the Member States. However, the preamble to the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union of 7 December 2000 (OJ 2000 C 364, p. 1), as adapted in Strasbourg on 12 December 2007 (OJ C 303, p. 1) ('the Charter') refers to it as a 'principle'. For its part, the second paragraph of Article 19(1) TEU declares that 'Member States shall provide remedies sufficient to ensure effective legal protection in the fields covered by Union law'.

19 – Judgments in Case 5/88 Wachauf [1989] ECR 2609, paragraph 18 and Joined Cases C-20/00 and C-64/00 Booker Aquaculture and Hydro Seafood [2003] ECR I-7411, paragraph 65 et seq.

20 – Article 34 of the Rome Convention prevents public bodies from relying on the rights set forth therein before the European Court of Human Rights; however, the Strasbourg Court has, in particular circumstances, extended the protection of Article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights to certain public law bodies: see, for example, its judgment of 9 December 1994, The Holy Monasteries v Greece, Series A No 301-A, pp. 34-35, paragraph 49, which requires that such bodies should not exercise governmental powers, which is obviously not the case in relation to the Simvoulio.

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Articles 1(1) and (3) and 2(1) and (6) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33), as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1; 'Directive 89/665').

2 The reference has been made in the context of a dispute between Combinatie Spijker Infrabouw/De Jonge Konstruktie, Van Spijker Infrabouw BV and De Jonge Konstruktie BV ('Combinatie and others') and Provincie Drenthe (Province of Drenthe; 'Provincie'), concerning the award of a public works contract.

Legal context

Union legislation

3 The fifth recital of Directive 89/665 states:

'Whereas, since procedures for the award of public contracts are of such short duration, competent review bodies must, among other things, be authorised to take interim measures aimed at suspending such a procedure or the implementation of any decisions which may be taken by the contracting authority; whereas the short duration of the procedures means that the aforementioned infringements need to be dealt with urgently'.

4 Article 1(1) and (3) of Directive 89/665 provide:

'1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC, and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or nation[al] rules implementing that law.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.'

5 Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665 read:

'1. The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.

2. The powers specified in paragraph 1 may be conferred on separate bodies responsible for different aspects of the review procedure.

3. Review procedures need not in themselves have an automatic suspensive effect on the contract award procedures to which they relate.

4. The Member States may provide that when considering whether to order interim measures the body responsible may take into account the probable consequences of the measures for all interests likely to be harmed, as well as the public interest, and may decide not to grant such measures where their negative consequences could exceed their benefits. A decision not to grant interim measures shall not prejudice any other claim of the person seeking these measures.

5. The Member States may provide that where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision was taken unlawfully, the contested decision must first be set aside by a body having the necessary powers.

6. The effects of the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 1 on a contract concluded subsequent to its award shall be determined by national law.

Furthermore, except where a decision must be set aside prior to the award of damages, a Member State may provide that, after the conclusion of a contract following its award, the powers of the body responsible for the review procedures shall be limited to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement.'

6 By virtue, respectively, of Article 36 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54) and Article 33 of Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 1), Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682) and Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1977 L 13, p. 1), have been repealed.

7 Article 82 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114) provides that Directive 92/50, save for Article 41 thereof, and Directives 93/36 and 93/37 are repealed. References to those repealed directives as a whole are to be construed as references to Directive 2004/18.

8 According to Article 7(c) of Directive 2004/18, as amended by Commission Regulation (EC) No 2083/2005 of 19 December 2005 (OJ 2005 L 333, p. 28), that directive was applicable, between 1 January 2006 and 31 December 2007, to public works contracts with a value exclusive of value added tax (VAT) estimated to be equal to or greater than EUR 5 278 000.

9 Article 9(5)(a) of Directive 2004/18 provides:

'Where a proposed work or purchase of services may result in contracts being awarded at the same time in the form of separate lots, account shall be taken of the total estimated value of all such lots.

National legislation

10 At the time of the facts giving rise to the dispute in the main proceedings, the Kingdom of the Netherlands had not adopted specific measures for transposing Directive 89/665 into national law, taking the view that Netherlands legislation in force already met the requirements of that directive.

11 According to the information in the Court's file, the award of public contracts is a matter for private law, the award of a public contract constitutes an act of private law, and decisions preliminary to the award of a public contract taken by administrative bodies are regarded as preparatory acts of private law. The civil courts have jurisdiction to hear disputes on the award of public contracts as regards both the adoption of protective measures and the procedure on the substance. The administrative courts do not have jurisdiction, unless a law provides otherwise.

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

12 According to the order for reference, the Provincie decided to renew two bascule bridges on the Erica-Ter Apel navigable waterway in the Commune of Emmen (Netherlands). That navigable waterway is stated to be of great importance at the international level. The European Union granted a subsidy in support of that project, on condition that the works were carried out within a certain time-limit, fixed at 1 July 2008.

13 The contract for the renewal of the bascule bridges was made the subject-matter of a public call for tenders at European level. The contract notice of 13 July 2007 was published in the supplement to the Official Journal of the European Union.

14 The tenderers were subjected to certain conditions, particularly as regards technical capacity, integrity and solvency. Other conditions concerned the tenders themselves, particularly as regards the evidence which had to accompany them. The criterion for award of the contract was the lowest price.

15 The contract notice was amended by a notice of 23 July 2007.

16 The tenders, which had to be lodged before 19 September 2007, were opened on that date, and the Provincie issued a report at the conclusion of that operation. It was stated therein, amongst other things, that four tenderers had submitted a tender, and that the lowest tender, of EUR 1 117 200, was that of Machinefabriek Emmen BV (‘MFE’), whilst Combinatie’s tender, of EUR 1 123 400, came second.

17 By letter of 2 October 2007, the Provincie informed Combinatie and others that it intended to award the contract to MFE because its tender was the lowest, without further explanations.

18 Combinatie and others objected to that decision, by letter of 9 October 2007, arguing that there was serious evidence to cast doubt as to whether MFE did in fact meet the criteria for the award of the contract. That letter gave rise to a telephone conversation with the staff of the Provincie, during which the question was raised whether a successor undertaking might use the references of its predecessor.

19 On 18 October 2007, Combinatie and others brought an application for interim measures against the Provincie before the Rechtbank Assen, from which it sought a ruling that MFE had submitted an invalid tender, that Combinatie had submitted the lowest tender, and that the Provincie should award the contract to the latter.

20 By letter of 1 November 2007, the Provincie informed all tenderers that it had decided to withdraw its call for tenders because, following an analysis by its award procedure staff, it had become apparent that the procedure was vitiated by such flaws that it was no longer possible to continue. According to that letter, the main flaws were as follows: (a) the requirement concerning experience had been reduced from 60 to 50 % of the market in question, and the requirement concerning turnover had been reduced from 150 to 125% of that amount; (b) the reference period for calculation of turnover had been extended from 3 to 5 years; (c) the criterion of experience had been modified in such a way that it no longer fully corresponded to the criterion initially laid down; (d) those modifications had been communicated on the website www.aanbestedingskalender.nl, but not on the website on which the call for tenders had been published, namely www.ted.europa.eu. In that same letter, the Provincie indicated that it was considering the possibility of making a fresh call for tenders.

21 Combinatie and others took the view that the letter of 1 November 2007 was not a factor sufficient to enable it to withdraw its application for interim measures, but it nevertheless modified the claims made therein.

22 On 9 November 2007, MFE intervened in the interim proceedings on the advice of the Provincie, claiming that the court hearing those proceedings should award the contract to MFE.

23 By judgment of 28 November 2007, the judge hearing the application for interim measures at the Rechtbank Assen took the view that MFE had convincingly argued, by means of documents lodged during the award procedure and commented upon at the hearing, that the works which had been carried out in the past by Machinefabriek Hidding BV, which during 2005 became Synmet Engineering & Production BV, could be attributed to it. The judge hearing the application for interim measures also found that MFE had met the conditions laid down by the Provincie in the call for tenders and provided the necessary information in time, that the signature of the model K declaration lodged by MFE's representative should be regarded as sufficient, and that MFE had submitted the lowest tender.

24 The judge hearing the application for interim measures ruled that the Provincie had not acted consistently when it defined the turnover and experience criteria, and that substantive changes had been introduced into the call for tenders. Nevertheless, the court found that the changes had been made at an early stage of the award procedure, that those changes did not appear to have been introduced in order to favour one of the tenderers, and that neither did it appear that third parties had submitted a tender after the project was modified. In those circumstances, the court held that the changes were not of sufficient importance to permit the conclusion that the call for tender procedure had not been sufficiently transparent.

25 The court considered that, having regard to the principles of equality and legitimate expectations, and by reason of pre-contractual good faith, it was no longer permissible for the Provincie, at that stage of the award procedure, to award, following a second call for tenders, the same works contract to an undertaking other than that which fulfilled the conditions laid down at the time of the first call for tenders.

26 The court therefore prohibited the Provincie from awarding the contract to an undertaking other than MFE, and declared that decision immediately enforceable.

27 On 3 December 2007, the Provincie awarded the contract to MFE.

28 On 11 December 2007, Combinatie and others brought an interlocutory action before the Gerechsthof Leeuwarden, claiming that the judgment of the Rechtbank Assen of 28 November 1997 should be set aside.

29 By interlocutory judgment of 30 January 2008, the Gerechsthof Leeuwarden dismissed that application on the ground that MFE had a protected interest in the execution of the judgment of the Rechtbank Assen.

30 The Gerechtshof Leeuwarden held that the contract concluded meanwhile between the Provincie and MFE should be regarded as having been concluded in a legally valid manner and that, apart from individual cases, the mere fact that the call for tenders procedure was vitiated by defects did not render that validity open to challenge. The Gerechtshof concluded that the only action remaining open to Combinatie and others, were an infringement of the law on public contracts to be established, was an action for damages.

31 On 19 December 2007, Combinatie and others lodged a further appeal against the interim judgment, seeking the annulment of that judgment and the award of the contract. It desisted from that appeal after becoming aware of the interlocutory judgment of the Gerechtshof Leeuwarden of 30 January 2008 and decided to sue the Provincie for damages before the Rechtbank Assen. The writ was issued on 29 February 2008.

32 In the context of that action, the Rechtbank Assen considers that the decision of 1 November 2007, whereby the Provincie decided to withdraw its award decision of 2 October 2007 and make a fresh call for tenders, is the only correct application of the law on public contracts. It considers that the Provincie could not reduce the experience requirement from 60 to 50% and the turnover requirement from 150 to 125%, that it could not extend the reference period for calculation of turnover from 3 to 5 years, and that it should have published the changes which it thus made to the call for tenders on the same internet site as that on which it had published that call. The Rechtbank Assen states that, for those reasons, it intends to give a definitive judgment in substitution for the interim judgment. The Rechtbank considers that, since the contract has been awarded and the works already begun, or perhaps even finished, the only issue is whether to award damages to Combinatie and others.

33 The Rechtbank Assen questions whether that unlawful act falls to be ascribed to the Provincie, given the circumstances and the statutory structure of legal protection within which it took place. The major social interests to which the Provincie refers and the decision of the court hearing the application for interim measures, along with the Netherlands legislature's choice of legal protection system, might serve as justification.

34 In those circumstances, the Rechtbank Assen decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) (a) Must Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665 be interpreted as meaning that they have not been complied with if the legal protection to be afforded by national courts in disputes relating to tendering procedures governed by European law is impeded by the fact that conflicting decisions may arise under a system in which both administrative courts and civil courts may have jurisdiction with respect to the same decision and its consequences?

(b) Is it permissible in this context for the administrative courts to be confined to forming an opinion and ruling on the tendering decision, and if so, why and/or under what conditions?

(c) Is it permissible in this context for the Algemene wet bestuursrecht (Netherlands General Law on Administrative Law), which, as a rule, governs applications for access to the administrative courts, to exclude such applications in the case of decisions concerning the conclusion of a contract by the contracting authority with one of the tenderers, and if so, why and/or under what conditions?

(d) Is the answer to Question 2 of relevance in this context?

(2) (a) Must Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665 be interpreted as meaning that they have not been complied with if the only procedure for obtaining a rapid decision is characterised by the fact that it is in principle geared to a rapid mandatory measure, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that [no] evidence is, as a rule, presented in other than written form and that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable?

(b) If not, does this also apply if the decision does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of a decision-making process leading to such a final decision?

(c) Does it make a difference in this context if the decision is binding only on the parties to the proceedings, even though other parties may have an interest?

(3) Is it compatible with Directive 89/665 for a court, in interim relief proceedings, to order the contracting public authority to take a tendering decision which is subsequently deemed, in proceedings on the substance, to be contrary to tendering rules under European law?

(4) (a) If the answer to the previous question is in the negative, must the contracting public authority be deemed liable in that regard, and if so, in what sense?

(b) Does the same apply if the answer to that question is in the affirmative?

(c) If that authority is required to pay damages, does Community law set criteria for determining and estimating those damages, and if so, what are they?

(d) If the contracting public authority cannot be deemed liable, is it possible, under Community law, for some other person to be shown to be liable, and on what basis?

(5) If it in fact appears to be impossible, or extremely difficult, under national law and/or with the aid of the answers to the above questions to attribute liability, what must the national court do?'

The questions referred

Preliminary observation

35 Pursuant to Article 1(1) thereof, Directive 89/665 applies as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directive 71/305, that latter directive having been replaced by Directive 93/37, itself replaced by Directive 2004/18.

36 According to Article 7(c) thereof, Directive 2004/18 applied, both at the date of publication of the contract notice and at the date of the award of the contract at issue in the main proceedings, to public works contracts the value of which, excluding VAT, was equal to, or higher than, EUR 5 278 000.

37 According to the order for reference, the amount of the successful tender in the procedure giving rise to the dispute in the main proceedings was EUR 1 117 200, including VAT.

38 The question therefore arises whether or not the contract at issue in the main proceedings falls within the scope of Directive 2004/18.

39 On 8 December 2009, the Court sent the referring court a request for clarification pursuant to Article 104(5) of the Rules of Procedure, with a view to determining the estimated value of the contract at issue in the main proceedings and, in particular, to determine whether that contract formed part of an aggregate whole for the purposes of Article 9(5)(a) of that directive, with the result that account would need to be taken of the estimated overall value of that aggregate whole.

40 By letter of 28 January 2010, which reached the Registry of the Court of Justice on 2 February 2010, the referring court indicated that the contract at issue in the main proceedings concerned works forming part of a more extensive project, namely the renewal of the Erica-Ter Apel navigable waterway, of an amount estimated at EUR 6 100 000.

41 It is possible to infer from that answer that the contract at issue in the main proceedings forms part of an aggregate whole for the purposes of Article 9(5)(a) of Directive 2004/18, the overall amount of which exceeds the threshold for the application of the latter. The Court therefore considers that that contract falls within the scope of that directive, and thus within the scope of Directive 89/665.

The first question

42 According to settled case-law, it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of the case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the Court (see, in particular, Case C-415/93 Bosman [1995] ECR I-4921, paragraph 59, and Case C-459/07 Elshani [2009] ECR I-2759, paragraph 40).

43 Nevertheless, the Court has held that it cannot give a preliminary ruling on a question submitted by a national court where it is quite obvious that the ruling sought by that court on the interpretation or validity of European Union (EU) law bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or its purpose, where the problem is hypothetical, or where the Court does not have before it the factual or legal material necessary to give a useful answer to the questions submitted to it (Bosman, paragraph 61; Elshani, paragraph 41).

44 As is apparent from the order for reference, the first question is based on the premiss that, in the context of national law, both the administrative courts and the civil courts may have jurisdiction in relation to the same decision taken in the context of the award of a public contract, which might lead to the adoption of contradictory court decisions.

45 However, the observations submitted to the Court by the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Commission show that, under Netherlands law, the civil courts generally have exclusive jurisdiction to hear disputes on the award of public contracts. According to those observations, the administrative courts have jurisdiction in the matter if a particular law so provides. In that case, they would have exclusive jurisdiction. It would therefore be impossible, under Netherlands law, for an administrative court and a civil court both to have jurisdiction concerning the same dispute on the award of public works contracts.

46 It is true that, when ruling in the context of a reference for a preliminary ruling, the Court of Justice may not rule on the interpretation of national laws or regulations (Case 32/76 Saieva [1976] ECR 1523, paragraph 7; Joined Cases 91/83 and 127/83 Heineken Brouwerijen [1984] ECR 3435, paragraph 10; and Joined Cases C-92/92 and C-326/92 Phil Collins and Others [1993] ECR I-5145, paragraph 13).

47 However, it is undisputed that, in the dispute in the main proceedings, there is no risk of contradictory decisions through the intervention of an administrative court, since all the proceedings have taken place before civil courts.

48 According to the Court's information, therefore, the interpretation of EU law requested in the first question bears no relation to the subject-matter of the dispute in the main proceedings.

49 Therefore, the first question must be regarded as inadmissible.

The second question

50 By its second question, part (a), the referring court asks, in essence, whether Directive 89/665 precludes a system in which, in order to obtain a rapid decision, the only procedure available is characterised by the fact that it is geared to a rapid mandatory measure, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that no evidence is, as a rule, presented other than in written form and that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable.

51 It should be remembered, as is stated in the fifth recital of Directive 89/665, that the short duration of procedures for the award of public contracts means that infringements of provisions of EU law need to be dealt with urgently.

52 In view of that objective, Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 provides for the establishment in the Member States of review procedures which are effective, and in particular as rapid as possible, against decisions which may have infringed EU law on public procurement or national rules implementing that law.

53 More specifically, Article 2(1)(a) of that directive requires Member States to make provision for the powers to 'take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned'.

54 Since Article 2(2) of the same directive provides that the powers specified in Article 2(1) may be conferred on separate bodies responsible for different aspects of the review procedure, it follows in particular that Member States may confer the power to take provisional measures and the power to award damages on separate bodies.

55 Article 2(3) of Directive 89/665 provides that review procedures need not in themselves have an automatic suspensive effect on the contract award procedures to which they relate. It follows that this directive allows Member States to provide, in their national legislation, that suspensive measures may be applied for, in appropriate cases, in proceedings which are separate from those concerning the substance of the procedures for the award of public contracts.

56 Article 2(4) of the said directive, which provides that a decision not to grant interim measures shall not prejudice any other claim of the person seeking those measures, also allows for the possibility of a procedure on the substance separate from the procedure seeking the grant of interim measures.

57 Thus, it may be concluded that Directive 89/665 leaves Member States a discretion in the choice of the procedural guarantees for which it provides, and the formalities relating thereto.

58 It should be noted that, since the characteristics of the interim procedure at issue in the main proceedings are inherent in procedures seeking the quickest possible adoption of interim measures, they comply, as such, with the requirements of Articles 1(1) and 2(1)(a) of Directive 89/665.

59 It follows from the above that Directive 89/665 does not preclude a system in which, in order to obtain a rapid decision, the only procedure available is characterised by the fact that it is geared to a rapid mandatory measure, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that no evidence is, as a rule, presented other than in written form and that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable.

60 By part (b) of its second question, the national court asks whether the above analysis also applies where the interim judgment does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of a decision-making process leading to such a final decision.

61 By its nature, an interim measure does not finally determine the legal situation. Moreover, the effects produced by the decision-making process of which that measure forms part follow from the internal legal order of the State concerned. Therefore, Directive 89/665 does not preclude the adoption of such a measure.

62 By part (c) of its second question, the referring court asks whether it makes a difference that the interim judgment is binding only on the parties, even though other parties may have an interest.

63 That part of the question is based on a hypothesis that does not obtain in the main dispute. In that dispute, the interim proceedings were not limited to the applicant and the defendant, namely Combinatie and others and the Provincie. On the contrary, a third interested party, namely MFE, was able to intervene to defend its interests, and moreover to do so with success.

64 Consequently, there is no need to reply to that part of the question.

65 Having regard to the above considerations, the answer to the second question is that Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665 do not preclude a system in which, in order to obtain a rapid decision, the only procedure available is characterised by the fact that it is geared to a rapid mandatory measure, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that no evidence is, as a rule, presented in other than written form, that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable and that the judgment does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of a decision-making process leading to such a final decision.

The third question

66 By its third question, the referring court asks in essence whether Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as precluding a court hearing an application for interim measures from ordering an awarding authority to adopt a decision to award a public contract which, in the course of a subsequent procedure on the substance, will be declared incompatible with Directive 2004/18.

67 As stated in paragraph 42, it is for the national court to assess, having regard to the particular features of the case, the relevance of the questions which it puts to the Court.

68 The third question of the referring court is based on the premiss that, in the main proceedings, the court hearing the application for interim measures has ordered the awarding authority to award the contract in question to MFE.

69 According to the findings contained in the order for reference, that premiss in inaccurate. As the referring court finds, the court hearing the application for interim measures has prohibited the Provincie from awarding the contract to an undertaking other than MFE. It is not, however, apparent from the information on file that the court hearing the application for interim measures required the Provincie to award the contract to MFE.

70 In that respect, in reply to a question put by the Court, Combinatie and others, the Kingdom of the Netherlands and the Commission argued that the Provincie could have pursued a number of courses of action following the interim judgment of 28 November 2007 other than awarding the contract at issue in the main proceedings to MFE.

71 It is, moreover, apparent from the replies received by the Court that the Provincie could have refrained from awarding the contract or brought court action on the substance, or appealed against the interim judgment of 28 November 2007 or, finally, have waited, before awarding the contract, for a possible appeal to be made by Combinatie and others against that interim judgment.

72 Concerning that fourth possibility, the documents before the Court show that Combinatie and others did in fact bring an appeal, on 11 December 2007, against the interim judgment, whereas the Provincie awarded the contract to MFE on 3 December 2007.

73 It follows that the hypothesis that a court hearing an interim application required an awarding authority to adopt a decision awarding a public contract does not obtain in the dispute in the main proceedings.

74 In order to give a useful answer to the referring court, it is thus necessary to reformulate the third question. By that question, the national court is actually asking whether Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as precluding a court hearing an application for interim measures, in order to adopt a provisional measure, from carrying out an interpretation of Directive 2004/18 which is subsequently classified as erroneous by the court dealing with the substance.

75 As has been emphasised in paragraphs 52 to 54 of this judgment, Directive 89/665 requires Member States to establish review procedures against decisions which may have infringed EU law on public procurement or national rules implementing that law.

76 Article 2(2) of that directive provides that such procedures may be handled by separate bodies from those responsible for actions on the substance, such as actions for damages.

77 Given the possibility of making provision for such a system, the possibility cannot be excluded that the court hearing an application for interim measures and the court dealing with the substance, called upon successively to deal with the same dispute, might give a divergent interpretation of the relevant EU legal rules. On the one hand, the court hearing an application for interim measures is called upon to give a decision in the context of an urgent procedure in which both the gathering of evidence and the examination of the pleas of the parties is necessarily more cursory than in the context of the proceedings on the substance. On the other hand, the intervention of the court hearing an application for interim measures is not designed, like that of the court hearing the substance, to rule definitively on the claims presented to it but to protect provisionally the interests at stake, possibly by balancing them.

78 The EU legislature has recognised the specific nature of the mission of the court hearing an application for interim measures in Article 2(1)(a) and (4) of Directive 89/665, by emphasising in particular the provisional nature of the measures taken by such a court.

79 It is inherent in the review system established by that directive that the court hearing the substance may adopt an interpretation of EU law, and of Directive 2004/18 in particular, which is different from that of the court hearing an application for interim measures. Such a divergence in assessment does not imply that a court system such as that at issue in the main proceedings does not comply with the requirements of Directive 89/665.

80 Therefore, the answer to the third question is that Directive 89/665 must be interpreted as not precluding a court hearing an application for interim measures, for the purposes of adopting a provisional measure, from carrying out an interpretation of Directive 2004/18 which is, subsequently, classified as erroneous by the court hearing the substance of the case.

The fourth question

81 By its fourth question, parts (a) and (b), the referring court asks, in essence, whether an awarding authority may be held liable where it makes a decision to award a public contract following a direction to that effect by a court hearing an application for interim measures, and that decision is, during subsequent proceedings on the substance, declared incompatible with EU rules on the award of public contracts.

82 Those questions are based on the hypothesis that, in the dispute in the main proceedings, the court hearing the application for interim measures directed the awarding authority to award the contract in question to a certain operator.

83 As explained in paragraphs 69 to 73 of this judgment, that is not the case in the dispute in the main proceedings.

84 Under those circumstances, it is not necessary to answer the fourth question, parts (a) and (b).

85 By its fourth question, part (c), the referring court asks, in essence, whether, if the awarding authority has to make good the damage arising from an infringement of EU law on the award of public contracts, EU law provides criteria on the basis of which the damage may be determined and estimated and, if so, what those criteria are.

86 Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665 clearly indicates that Member States must make provision for the possibility of awarding damages in the case of infringement of EU law on the award of public contracts, but contains no detailed statement either as to the conditions under which an awarding authority may be held liable or as to the determination of the amount of the damages which it may be ordered to pay.

87 That provision gives concrete expression to the principle of State liability for loss and damage caused to individuals as a result of breaches of EU law for which the State can be held responsible. According to case-law developed since the adoption of Directive 89/665, but which is now consistent, that principle is inherent in the legal order of the Union. The Court has held that individuals harmed have a right to reparation where three conditions are met: the rule of EU law infringed must be intended to confer rights on them; the breach of that rule must be sufficiently serious; and there must be a direct causal link between the breach and the loss or damage sustained by the individuals (Joined Cases C-6/90 and C-9/90 Francovich and Others [1991] ECR I-5357, paragraph 35; Joined Cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 Brasserie du Pêcheur and Factortame [1996] ECR I-1029, paragraphs 31 and 51; and Case C-445/06 Danske Slagterier [2009] ECR I-2119, paragraphs 19 and 20).

88 As matters stand at present, the case-law of the Court of Justice has not yet set out, as regards review of the award of public contracts, more detailed criteria on the basis of which damage must be determined and estimated.

89 As regards EU legislation, it should be noted that Directive 89/665 has been largely amended by Directive 2007/66/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 December 2007 amending Council Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC (OJ 2007 L 335, p. 31), adopted after the date of the facts which gave rise to the dispute in the main proceedings. However, on that occasion, the EU legislature refrained from adopting any provisions on that point.

90 In the absence of EU provisions in that area, it is for the legal order of each Member State to determine the criteria on the basis of which damage arising from an infringement of EU law on the award of public contracts must be determined and estimated (see, by analogy, Case C-315/01 GAT [2003] ECR I-6351, paragraph 46; and Case C 314/09 Strabag and Others [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 33) provided the principles of equivalence and effectiveness are complied with (see, to that effect, Joined Cases C-295/04 to C-298/04 Manfredi and Others [2006] ECR I-6619, paragraph 98).

91 It is apparent from well-established case-law that the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding an individual’s rights under EU law must be no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (principle of equivalence) and must not render practically impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by EU law (principle of effectiveness) (see, in particular, Case 33/76 Rewe-Zentralfinanz and Rewe-Zentral [1976] ECR 1989, paragraph 5; Case C-432/05 Unibet [2007] ECR I-2271, paragraph 43; Case C-268/06 Impact [2008] ECR I-2483, paragraph 46; and Case C-246/09 Bulicke [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 25).

92 Therefore, the answer to the fourth question, part (c) is that, as regards State liability for damage caused to individuals by infringements of EU law for which the State may be held responsible, the individuals harmed have a right to redress where the rule of EU law which has been infringed is intended to confer rights on them, the breach of that rule is sufficiently serious, and there is a direct causal link between the breach and the loss or damage sustained by the individuals. In the absence of any provisions of EU law in that area, it is for the internal legal order of each Member State, once those conditions have been complied with, to determine the criteria on the basis of which the damage arising from an infringement of EU law on the award of public contracts must be determined and estimated, provided the principles of equivalence and effectiveness are complied with.

93 In view of that answer, there is no need to reply to part (d) of the fourth question.

The fifth question

94 By the fifth question, the referring court asks what the national court must do if it proves impossible or extremely difficult in practice to attribute liability.

95 Given the answers to the previous questions and having regard to the Court's file on the case, there is nothing to indicate that that is so in the case in the main proceedings.

96 Therefore, this question does not require an answer.

Costs

97 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Second Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts, do not preclude a system in which, in order to obtain a rapid decision, the only procedure available is characterised by the fact that it is geared to a rapid mandatory measure, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that no evidence is, as a rule, presented other than in written form, that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable, and that the judgment does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of a decision-making process leading to such a final decision.

2. Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50, must be interpreted as not precluding a court hearing an application for interim measures, for the purposes of adopting a provisional measure, from carrying out an interpretation of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts which is, subsequently, classified as erroneous by the court hearing the substance of the case.

3. As regards State liability for damage caused to individuals by infringements of European Union (EU) law for which the State may be held responsible, the individuals harmed have a right to redress where the rule of EU law which has been infringed is intended to confer rights on them, the breach of that rule is sufficiently serious, and there is a direct causal link between the breach and the loss or damage sustained by the individuals. In the absence of any provisions of EU law in that area, it is for the internal legal order of each Member State, once those conditions have been complied with, to determine the criteria on the basis of which the damage arising from an infringement of EU law on the award of public contracts must be determined and estimated, provided the principles of equivalence and effectiveness are complied with.

OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL
CRUZ VILLALÓN
delivered on 14 September 2010 (1)

Case C-568/08

Combinatie Spijker Infrabouw/De Jonge Konstruktie

Provincie Drenthe

(Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Rechtbank Assen (Netherlands))

(Public procurement – Review procedures in matters relating to the award of public works and supply contracts – Provisional measures adopted in interim proceedings – Damages resulting from the infringement of European Union law – Criteria for attributing liability and quantifying damage)

1. The reference for a preliminary ruling from the Rechtbank Assen ('the Rechtbank') concerns the interpretation of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, (2) as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 (3) ('Directive 89/665').

2. By its five questions, most of which are in turn subdivided into several more, the Rechtbank asks the Court to give a ruling on two distinctly separate matters.

3. First, the matter of whether the review procedures introduced by Directive 89/665, and in particular Articles 1(1) and (3) and 2(1) and (6) thereof, preclude a national procedural rule on interim measures such as that of the Netherlands, which, in the field of public procurement, as a general rule, confers jurisdiction on the civil courts while laying down limits on the presentation of submissions and evidence and, finally, formulates those measures as independent of the substantive proceedings on the main issue leading to the final determination of the legal relationship, thereby conferring on those interim measures a certain degree of permanence.

4. Secondly, the Rechtbank asks whether, for the purposes of Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665, that is, to 'award damages to persons harmed by an infringement', European Union law sets criteria for attributing that liability and for determining and estimating the damage.

5. In those terms, the present case provides the opportunity to clarify certain points of Directive 89/665 which are of great significance for the purpose of upholding the legality which European Union law requires in the context of public procurement.

I – The facts

6. With a view to renovating, in the commune of Emmen, two bascule bridges on the waterway link of the Erica-Ter Apel network of canals, the Provincie Drenthe ('the Provincie') initiated a public call for tenders for the award of a works contract, published in the Official Journal of the European Union on 18 July 2007. (4)

7. The European Union granted a subsidy to the project on condition that the works were completed within a given period, which expired on 1 July 2008.

8. Four tenderers submitted bids, the lowest tender being that of the undertaking Machinefabriek Emmen BV ('MFE') and the second lowest that of Combinatie Spijker Infrabouw ('the Combinatie').

9. On 2 October 2007 the Provincie informed the Combinatie that it intended to award the contract to MFE because the latter had submitted the lowest tender.

10. On 18 October 2007, the Combinatie reacted to the tendering decision by requesting that the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings at the Rechtbank Assen ('the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings') order that the tender submitted by MFE was invalid and that the Combinatie was therefore the undertaking which had tendered the lowest price and also that the Combinatie should be awarded the contract in the event that the Provincie should proceed to make the award.

11. However, pending those interim proceedings, on 1 November 2007, the Provincie informed all the tenderers that it was withdrawing the call for tenders, thereby revoking its tendering decision notified on 2 October 2007, on the basis of what it regarded as a number of breaches of essential procedural requirements. (5)

12. This did not induce the Combinatie to withdraw its application for interim measures. On 9 November 2007, MFE, the undertaking initially awarded the contract, requested that the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings award the contract to it. At the hearing, the provincie argued that it did not wish to award the contract to any of the tenderers.

13. On 28 November 2007, the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings issued a – provisionally enforceable – order, whose decisive passage, for our purposes, reads as follows: taking into account that 'the Provincie stated by letter of 2 October 2007 that it intended to award the contract to Machinefabriek Emmen, although proceedings for an interim order were not brought within 15 days, the Provincie cannot, at this stage of the tendering procedure and in accordance with the principles of equal treatment, the protection of legitimate expectations and the principle of pre-contractual good faith, award the contract by means of a second tendering procedure for the same contract to a person other than the person entitled to be awarded the contract on the basis of the first tendering procedure', (6) which, according to the operative part of the order, 'prevents the award of the contract to a third party other than Machinefabriek'.

14. Five days later, on 3 December 2007, the Provincie awarded the contract to MFE.

15. On 11 December 2007 the Combinatie brought an appeal before the Gerechtshof Leeuwarden, applying for suspension of enforcement of the decision of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings.

16. By interlocutory decision of 30 January 2008, the Gerechtshof Leeuwarden dismissed the application for suspension of enforcement, considering that MFE had a reasonable interest in enforcement of the decision of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings. Although the appeal could continue in respect of the remaining claims for the order of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings to be set aside or upheld, (7) the Combinatie withdrew its appeal.

17. The Combinatie subsequently brought an action before the Rechtbank seeking compensation from the Provincie for the damage caused as a consequence of the outcome of the invitation to tender for public works. The application was lodged on 29 February 2008. On 22 December 2008, the Rechtbank submitted this reference for a preliminary ruling.

II – The questions referred for a preliminary ruling

18. In its order for reference, the Rechtbank takes the view, and this point will prove particularly relevant, that the decision of the Provincie to revoke its tendering decision of 2 October 2007 and to repeat the tendering procedure was the only option which is consistent with the proper application of the law on public procurement.

19. On the basis of that premiss, the Rechtbank stayed the proceedings and referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 267 TFEU:

‘1(a) Must Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665/EEC be interpreted as meaning that they have not been complied with if the legal protection to be afforded by national courts in disputes relating to tendering procedures governed by European law is impeded by the fact that conflicting decisions may arise under a system in which both administrative courts and civil courts may have jurisdiction with respect to the same decision and its consequences?

1(b) Is it permissible in this context for the administrative courts to be confined to forming an opinion and ruling on the tendering decision, and if so, why and/or under what conditions?

1(c) Is it permissible in this context for the Algemene wet bestuursrecht (Netherlands General Law on Administrative Law), which, as a rule, governs applications for access to the administrative courts, to exclude such applications in the case of decisions concerning the conclusion of a contract by the contracting authority with one of the tenderers, and if so, why and/or under what conditions?

1(d) Is the answer to Question 2 of relevance in this context?

2(a) Must Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665 be interpreted as meaning that they have not been complied with if the only procedure for obtaining a rapid decision is characterised by the fact that it is in principle geared to a rapid mandatory measure, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that [no] evidence is, as a rule, presented in other than written form and that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable?

2(b) If not, does this also apply if the decision does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of a decision-making process leading to such a final decision?

2(c) Does it make a difference in this context if the decision is binding only on the parties to the proceedings, even though other parties may have an interest?

3. Is it compatible with Directive 89/665 for a court, in interim relief proceedings, to order the contracting public authority to take a tendering decision which is subsequently deemed, in proceedings on the substance, to be contrary to tendering rules under European law?

4(a) If the answer to the previous question is in the negative, must the contracting public authority be deemed liable in that regard, and if so, in what sense?

4(b) Does the same apply if the answer to that question is in the affirmative?

4(c) If that authority is required to pay damages, does Community law set criteria for determining and estimating those damages, and if so, what are they?

4(d) If the contracting public authority cannot be deemed liable, is it possible, under Community law, for some other person to be shown to be liable, and on what basis?

5. If it in fact appears to be impossible, or extremely difficult, under national law and/or with the aid of the answers to the above questions to attribute liability, what must the national court do?’

III – Procedure before the Court

20. The decision which resulted in this reference for a preliminary ruling was registered at the Registry of the Court of Justice on 22 December 2008.

21. Observations were submitted, within the period prescribed by Article 23 of the EC Statute of the Court of Justice, by the Combinatie, the Provincie, the Government of the Netherlands and the Commission.

22. After its general meeting of 1 December 2009, the Court decided, pursuant to Article 104(5) of its Rules of Procedure, to request a series of clarifications from the Rechtbank concerning the economic value of the contract tendered by the Provincie. By its response lodged at the Registry of the Court on 2 February 2010, the Rechtbank explained that that contract formed part of more general works, those relating to the Erica-Ter Apel navigable link, whose overall value, excluding VAT, is estimated at EUR 6 100 000.

23. When the case was again discussed at the general meeting of 23 March 2010, the decision was made to send a series of written questions to the parties involved in the reference for a preliminary ruling, concerning the enforcement of interim measures in Netherlands law, the possibilities it provides for annulling the contract and the options available to the Provincie after the interim order.

24. The final responses translated into French were received on 7 June 2010, since when this Opinion has been in preparation, as none of the parties requested that a hearing be held.

IV – Relevant law

A – European Union law

1. Directive 2004/18/EC (8)

25. Article 7(c) sets the financial threshold for public works contracts:

‘This Directive shall apply to public contracts which are not excluded … and which have a value exclusive of value added tax (VAT) estimated to be equal to or greater than the following thresholds:

EUR 5 278 000 for public works contracts.’ (9)

2. Directive 89/665

26. Pursuant to Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 ‘[t]he Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC, and 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law’. (10)

27. Article 1(3) states:

‘The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.’

28. Article 2(1), (5) and (6) provide:

‘1. The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.

5. The Member States may provide that where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision was taken unlawfully, the contested decision must first be set aside by a body having the necessary powers.

6. The effects of the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 1 on a contract concluded subsequent to its award shall be determined by national law.

Furthermore, except where a decision must be set aside prior to the award of damages, a Member State may provide that, after the conclusion of a contract following its award, the powers of the body responsible for the review procedures shall be limited to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement.

3. Article 2(7) of Directive 92/13/EEC (11)

29. Under this provision ‘[w]here a claim is made for damages representing the costs of preparing a bid or of participating in an award procedure, the person making the claim shall be required only to prove an infringement of Community law in the field of procurement or national rules implementing that law and that he would have had a real chance of winning the contract and that, as a consequence of that infringement, that chance was adversely affected.’

B – Netherlands law

30. The Netherlands did not adopt specific measures to transpose Directive 89/665, since it considered that its legislation complied with the requirements laid down by that directive. (12)

31. In the Netherlands, a particular organisational feature in this respect is that the conclusion of a public contract is governed by private law, (13) since the preceding decisions adopted by administrative authorities in the course of a tendering procedure (14) are regarded merely as decisions preliminary to a private legal act.

32. As a result, in the Netherlands the civil courts (15) have sole jurisdiction to settle disputes concerning the award of public contracts, both as regards the adoption of interim measures and the substantive proceedings, which are limited to obtaining compensation for the damage caused.

33. The administrative courts have no jurisdiction, (16) unless a special law provides otherwise. (17)

34. Articles 254 to 260 of the Nederlands Wetboek van Burgerlijke Rechtsvordering (the Netherlands Code of Civil Procedure, ‘the Code of Civil Procedure’) govern proceedings for interim measures which, since they are restricted to cases of urgency, are intended to be rapid and are entirely dominated by oral procedure and subject to specific provisions concerning evidence unlike those governing ordinary proceedings.

V – Issues of admissibility

A – A preliminary matter: the amount of the project

35. The Commission and the Netherlands Government submit in their observations that the order for reference does not disclose the amount of the planned works contract, which requires a preliminary clarification.

36. It is a prerequisite for the application of Directive 89/665 in this case that the tender of the Provincie was above the minimum financial threshold laid down by Directive 2004/18, which, as stated above, at the time was EUR 5 278 000 in the case of public works contracts.

37. Moreover, pursuant to Article 9 of Directive 2004/18, the calculation of the estimated value of the public contract must be based on the total amount payable, net of VAT, as estimated by the contracting authority (paragraph 1), and no works project may be subdivided 'to prevent its coming within the scope of this Directive' (paragraph 3). In cases where the proposed work might result in contracts being awarded at the same time in the form of separate lots, 'account shall be taken of the total estimated value of all such lots' (paragraph 5(a)).

38. In the light of the Rechtbank's clarifications in that regard, the works comprising the subject-matter of the main dispute form part of a huge project for the construction of a navigable international tourist link between Germany and the Netherlands. Those works were distributed over various stages, but pursue the same objective from a functional point of view, so that, pursuant to the above provisions, the project as a whole must not be divided for the purpose of valuing it. For all the foregoing reasons, as the national court states, and in view of the fact that the competent authority responsible for implementation determined the eligible costs at EUR 6 100 000, the amount of all the projects must be regarded as far exceeding that financial threshold.

39. Accordingly, the public works contract for the renovation of the two bascule bridges on the waterway link of the Erica-Ter Apel network of canals, on the basis of its amount, is governed by Directive 2004/18 and, consequently, is subject to the review guarantees established by Directive 89/665.

B – The hypothetical nature of the first question

40. The Rechtbank put to the Court a detailed set of questions, the first of which, as will be seen below and as is evident, is merely hypothetical in nature and, therefore, inadmissible.

41. It must be remembered from the outset that the national dispute in which this question arises consists in civil proceedings seeking compensation for damage caused by the unlawful award of a public contract which, as has been stated, is governed in the Netherlands by private law. However, the Rechtbank introduces in the first question a series of questions which are not (or are only distantly) related to the actual nature of the proceedings or to the main action underlying it, thereby making it possible to raise an objection of inadmissibility against those questions. (18)

42. The Rechtbank starts from the premiss (Question 1(a)) that certain provisions of Directive 89/665 may be infringed where legal protection is impeded (incorporating a value judgment in the actual wording of the question), since, in the Netherlands legal system, it is possible that 'conflicting decisions may arise' in civil and administrative courts. In the following three sections of Question 1, the Rechtbank essentially maintains that premiss, as evidenced by the expression 'in this context', which is used in each of them, and asks whether it is permissible, on the one hand, for the administrative courts to be confined to forming an opinion and ruling on the tendering decision (Question 1(b)) and, on the other hand, for the General Law on Administrative Law to exclude such applications in the case of decisions of the administration concerning the award (Question 1(c)), (19) and seeks to ascertain, finally, (Question 1(d)), whether the answers to that first question depend on whether, in the light of the second question, the Court finds that there has been an infringement of European Union law on account of the way in which interim measures are provided for in the Netherlands legal system.

43. There is no doubt that all the sections of Question 1 are hypothetical in nature. In that regard, it is sufficient to point out that the court of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings, the Gerechtshof Leeuwarden (First Civil Section, acting as an appeal court) and the Rechtbank (the referring court, before which the claim for damages is being brought), that is to say all the courts involved since the dispute arose following the Combinatie's application, form part of the civil court system.

44. Irrespective of whether, as the parties state as regards the Netherlands legislation, (20) simultaneous jurisdiction by the civil and administrative courts might arise on an exceptional basis, that has not occurred in this case, in any event, and it may be inferred from the order of the Rechtbank that the opposite is true. Indeed, the latter makes no reference, in the present case, to the involvement of an administrative court, since the actual wording of Question 1(a), referring to the fact that they 'may have jurisdiction', appears to be merely hypothetical; nor does it identify the 'same decision' over which both court systems may have jurisdiction, where, in addition, there is a distinction between the subject-matter of the actions before the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings (the decision to award the contract to MFE) and the Rechtbank, which rules only on the claim for compensation for damages, from which it should be concluded that no conflicting decisions concerning the same decision were – ever in this case – taken, since the subject-matters under dispute and the claims put forward differ substantially.

45. Given the manifest absence of involvement of the administrative courts in this case, on which the sub-questions in Question 1 hinge, and taking into consideration that Article 267 TFEU does not allow the Court to deliver a mere advisory opinion on general or hypothetical questions, (21) I am of the opinion that it should be declared inadmissible.

VI – The substance

46. The analyses of the four remaining questions raised by the Rechtbank, quite apart from a certain obscurity as to their meaning, may be grouped together according to a threefold perspective, for the purposes of their examination in relation to Directive 89/665: (A) the organisation of interim judicial protection, (B) the absence of substantive justice other than that related to obtaining compensation and (C) the determination of liability and its translation into compensation for damages.

A – The organisation of interim judicial protection: answer to Question 2

47. In general, in Question 2 the Rechtbank asks whether a summary procedure for interim measures which, independent as regards any proceedings as to the substance, is geared to their rapid adoption, making no provision for oral argument or for evidence other than documentary evidence and not subject to application of the general rules on evidence, is compatible with Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665, where, in addition, the judicial decision approving those interim measures does not lead to the final resolution of the legal situation or have erga omnes effect, since it binds only the parties to the proceedings.

48. Perhaps because of the pre-eminence that the Netherlands legal system confers on interim measures, of which the referring court is fully aware, the latter calls into question the procedural organisation of the system of interim judicial protection from the perspective of European Union law, exclusively on the basis of the reasons set out in the preceding paragraph.

49. From the outset, it must be pointed out that Directive 89/665 confers on the Member States broad discretion both as regards the choice of courts having jurisdiction to uphold the procedural guarantees conferred by it, and as regards their procedural organisation.

50. Accordingly, it is for the domestic legal system of each Member State, in the absence of European Union rules, to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights which individuals derive from the European Union, (22) subject always to the requirement to protect those rights in a manner consistent with the principles of effectiveness (23) and equivalence. (24)

51. It must be emphasised that the only conflicting criterion provided by the Rechtbank is that of Directive 89/665, which makes no provision in that respect, and accordingly there is no reason for censure, since the order for reference does not describe how that special procedural organisation has an adverse effect on the fundamental rights of individuals, in particular, on effective judicial protection, as a consequence, where appropriate, of infringement of the principles of equivalence and effectiveness.

52. Moreover, without examining the particular features of the evidence, the way in which the adversarial principle is formulated or the effects of the interim measures, (25) it seems logical that, because of its purpose and nature, the procedure for their adoption should differ from the procedure for ordinary proceedings, but it is also true that Directive 89/665 specifically encourages rapid interim judicial protection. That directive coordinates the laws of the Member States with the aim, inter alia, of securing the adoption of measures 'at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures'. (26)

53. Moreover, Question 2(b) recalls the fact that 'the decision [adopting the interim measures] does not form part of a decision-making process leading to such a final [legal] decision'.

54. This qualification is concerned with the autonomous nature of interim proceedings within the framework for legal actions in the Netherlands which, far from being put forward as a ground for criticism for European Union law on public procurement, constitutes a requirement for the case-law which interprets it. In particular, by regarding proceedings for interim measures as merely ancillary to the substantive proceedings instead of actually regarding them as autonomous proceedings, the Court has allowed some actions for failure to fulfil obligations brought by the Commission. (27)

55. Similarly, the fact that the measures are adopted as interim measures reflects a provisional function, as is expressly illustrated by Article 2(1)(a) of the Directive, which refers to interim measures, (28) which implies that, in principle, the legal relationships to which they apply are not affected definitively.

56. In summary, some of those characteristics, described almost as abnormalities by the national court in Question 2, appear, instead, as characteristics inherent to interim measures.

57. I therefore suggest that the Court's answer to Question 2 should be that, to the extent that it has not been established that the effectiveness of European Union law has been adversely affected, Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665 do not preclude national legislation providing for only one procedure for obtaining an interim measure, characterised by the fact that it is geared to their rapid adoption, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that evidence is, as a rule, presented solely in written form and that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable (Question 2(a)), irrespective of whether the judicial decision adopting that interim measure does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of the process in which that legal situation is finally determined (Question 2(b)) or whether that decision is binding only on the parties to the proceedings (Question 2(c)).

B – The tension between interim and substantive judicial protection: answer to Question 3

1. Preliminary considerations

58. In Question 3, the Court is asked to rule on whether it is compatible with Directive 89/665 for a court, in proceedings for interim relief, to order the contracting authority to take a contract award decision which is subsequently deemed, in proceedings on the substance, to be contrary to tendering rules under European Union law.

59. The parties involved in this reference for a preliminary ruling – apart from the Provincie – maintain that the interim order of 28 November 2007 did not in fact order the Provincie to award the contract to MFE, from which they conclude that that question must be reformulated, (29) since they consider that the Rechtbank's wording is based on an incorrect premiss.

60. In this question, proceeding as the Commission and the Netherlands suggest would run the risk of distorting the national court's intended meaning, since, that court, in reality, seeks an examination of what I have called the tension between interim and substantive judicial protection.

61. Since Article 267 TFEU is based on a clear separation of functions between the national courts and the Court of Justice, when ruling on the interpretation or validity of European Union provisions, the latter is empowered to do so only on the basis of the facts which the national court puts before it and it is for the national court to ascertain the facts which have given rise to the dispute and to establish the consequences which they have for the judgment which it is required to deliver. (30)

62. I therefore consider that the Court cannot substitute its assessment for that of the Rechtbank, which would be the case if the Court reworded the question because it considered that the Rechtbank's order for reference misinterpreted a previous judicial decision, (31) which, moreover, it had itself issued (as the court of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings). Instead, it must limit itself to providing a helpful answer, comprehensively appraising the facts of the case. (32)

2. The differing views expressed in the interim measure and the substantive proceedings

63. The Rechtbank, in its view, in contrast to the order of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings, considers in paragraph 4.18 of its order that 'the decision taken by the Provinc[i]e to withdraw the contract award decision of 2 October 2007 and to call for fresh tenders [was] the only correct application of the law on public procurement'.

64. Accordingly, analysed from a literal perspective, Question 3 does not seem to raise too many uncertainties.

65. No matter how autonomous interim proceedings may be, decisions adopted in the course of such proceedings, in so far as they are merely temporary (ultimately they are provisional), may be revoked, amended or upheld in any substantive proceedings, provided that the person entitled to bring them does so, (33) and therefore any conflict should not raise problems.

66. This approach seems to be embodied in the order for reference itself (paragraph 4.18 in fine), where it states that the (final) judgment 'will replace the view expressed by the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings'.

67. That being the case, it is then necessary to ask where the problem lies. The keys are provided by the order of the Rechtbank itself, which states that, where the interim measure and the court dealing with the substance express differing views, '[p]roblems arise [because t]here will … be two separate and distinct judicial decisions which differ, or may differ, in their effect on the parties to the proceedings and on third parties' (paragraph 4.8), and because at the time of the final judgment 'the contract will already have been awarded, the work may even have been completed, and all that will remain is the possible award of damages to the Combinatie' (also paragraph 4.18 in fine).

68. To sum up, those concerns implicitly suggest another aspect which could operate as a limit to a negative response to Question 3: Directive 89/665 does not prevent a court, in interim relief proceedings, from ordering the contracting authority to take a contract award decision which is subsequently deemed, in proceedings on the substance, to be contrary to European Union law on public procurement, provided that the effects of that interim measure may be replaced by the new situation stemming from the decision on the substance.

69. In the final analysis, I cannot avoid concluding that in the Netherlands, during the period between communication of the award decision and the contract, interim measures seem to be the only remedy which would be effective in preventing conclusion of the contract, since there is no possibility of applying for the award decision to be set aside either before or after it is issued, as the Netherlands Government confirms. (34) On the contrary, under European Union law, the conclusion of the contract is, temporally and functionally, the key point for bringing an action to set aside the award decision, since, although European Union law does not require proceedings to set it aside once the contract has been concluded, it nevertheless requires that, prior to that moment, the Member States provide the injured party with the opportunity to bring proceedings to set aside the award decision. (35)

70. However, the fact that in the Netherlands, before the contract is concluded, the award decision is not subject to review – whether administrative or judicial – in the form of an annulment claim (36) is not particularly relevant in the circumstances of this case. (37)

71. This is because, first, it must be remembered that the Combinatie voluntarily withdrew its appeal before the Gerechtshof Leeuwarden and preferred to bring substantive proceedings for the award of damages, (38) and because, secondly, after applying for damages and in so far as the contract had already been concluded (on 3 December 2007), the action to set aside could not yet be required under Article 2(5) and (6) of Directive 89/665. The latter consideration also shows the insignificance of the views set out by the Rechtbank in paragraph 4.14 of its order, based on the appropriateness of ordering the setting aside of the award decision prior to the award of damages. (39)

72. However, it must be made clear that the two previous arguments are valid because, in this case and because of the way in which the Rechtbank worded its questions, there has been no breach of the principles of effectiveness and equivalence, the basic limits of the procedural autonomy of the States, hence the lack of provision for an action to set aside is not fundamental for the purposes of an answer.

73. In the light of all those considerations, I suggest that the Court should answer Question 3 to the effect that Directive 89/665 does not prevent the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings from taking a differing view to that of the court dealing with the substantive proceedings on the main issue, provided that this does not prejudice the results required by Directive 89/665 and, in particular, the three guarantees provided for in Article 2(1), as they have been interpreted in Community case-law.

C – Determination of liability and its translation into an award of damages: answers to Question 4 and Question 5

1. The Court's lack of jurisdiction to attribute liability in the dispute before the national courts

74. In Question 4, the Rechtbank asks the Court to rule on who may be deemed to be liable for any injury caused to the Combinatie, raising further questions on the possibility of declaring the contracting authority liable – both in the event that the answer to Question 3 is that the Netherlands system of interim measures is incompatible with Directive 89/665 (Question 4(a)) and in the event that it is found to be compatible (Question 4(b)) – and also raising the possibility of other parties being liable '[i]f the contracting public authority cannot be deemed liable' (Question 4(d)). Question 4(c) is, at the outset, based on the premiss that 'that authority is required to pay damages' and goes on to request clarification concerning any criteria set by European Union law for determining and estimating those damages.

75. Question 5 functions as a type of conclusion to the preceding questions, since it seeks to ascertain 'what … the national court [must] do' where, in the light of the possible answers and pursuant to national law, 'it … appears to be impossible, or extremely difficult … to attribute liability'.

76. I am of the view that the Court is unable to provide guidance to the Rechtbank concerning who is liable for any injury caused to the Combinatie by infringement of the tendering rules, since that constitutes the essence of the main proceedings. The reasons I gave above for rejecting the rewording of Question 3, which are based on the national court's jurisdiction to assess the actual facts and circumstances of the dispute before it, now militate against the Court's having jurisdiction to rule on the liability of the various operators involved in the tendering procedure for the works in Emmen.

77. In my view, it is solely for the Rechtbank to assess (40) points such as whether there was any liability and whether, where appropriate, it must be attributed to the Provincie, to the State – on account of the actions of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings – or to any other person taking into consideration the evidence which has been shown to be relevant: the fact that the Provincie did not wait before making the award or appeal against the interim measures; the possible alternatives (if any) to making the award to MFE; the circumstances surrounding the provisional enforcement of the order of the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings, and; the Combinatie's voluntary withdrawal of the appeal lodged against that order.

78. Moreover, in so far as the action in the national proceedings may be based on infringement of European Union law, whether that is established (41) – which is most relevant in this case – is a matter solely for the Member State in the context of its national law on liability for financial loss. (42)

79. Accordingly, I consider that the Court should not answer the sections of Questions 4 and 5 which request a ruling on who must be deemed liable in the dispute before the national courts.

2. The criteria governing the attribution and the extension of the damage

80. Notwithstanding the foregoing, the Court must clarify for the Rechtbank whether European Union law provides criteria for determining, attributing and, finally, quantifying the damage.

a) Some preliminary considerations

81. It is necessary to clarify, from the outset, what the Rechtbank means when it asks the Court in Question 4(c) whether, '[i]f [the contracting public] authority is required to pay damages', European Union law sets criteria for determining and estimating the damages.

82. In principle, it may be concluded that the Rechtbank assumes that the answer the Question 4(c) will be in the affirmative and that the contracting body is liable.

83. None the less, that approach should not prevail, in so far as, although the Rechtbank limits Question 4(c) to the premiss that the Provincie may be liable, it remains true that its considerations do not rule out the possibility that liability may lie with other operators who, in one way or another, have been involved in the tendering procedure, and accordingly it is actually possible to interpret the national court's question as seeking to ascertain, generally, the criteria established in European Union law on public procurement for the award of compensation in connection with liability.

84. It must not be forgotten that the proper determination of liability for financial loss requires an assessment as to the existence of the damage as a prerequisite for any other steps: without the existence of damage, no mechanism for non-contractual liability should be triggered. At that stage, issues relating to the determination of the extent of the damage and its quantification come to the fore.

85. Clearly, in public procurement cases, those steps are very difficult, since, even assuming that rules of European Union law have been infringed, it is actually necessary to make a probability assessment in order to reach the conclusion that the excluded tenderer (in this case, the Combinatie) would finally have been awarded the contract if the tendering procedure had been conducted lawfully.

86. Nevertheless, the complexity I describe is not exclusive to this case in particular, but is inherent in a large number of cases concerning liability in tort, (43) which requires a court dealing with the substance of a case to apply abstract formulae based on the evidence available to it to enable it to assert, with a level of probability close to certainty, that the excluded tenderer would have been awarded the contract had the rules on contracting been complied with.

87. Another problem to be considered is that of what to incorporate in the damages which, for the purposes of compensation, may vary according to whether account is taken of only the objective costs which the tenderer incurred as a result of taking part in the public tender (actual loss) or other items, more difficult to establish, such as profits which were not earned (loss of profit) as a result of the unlawful exclusion.

88. However, that said, a clear distinction must be drawn between three areas connected with Directive 89/665:

– First: that of Directive 89/665 itself, which is intended to strengthen existing arrangements, at both the national and Union level, for ensuring the effective application of the directives on procurement, (44) to which end it imposes on the Member States the obligation to ensure that unlawful decisions of contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and as rapidly as possible and expressly includes in Article 2(1)(c) the award of damages to persons harmed by an infringement.

– Second: that of the more specific rules which govern the various proceedings in the Member States. Given that the provisions of Directive 89/665 merely form part of the approximation of national procedural instruments for ensuring compliance with European Union rules on public procurement, it is obvious that it is for the Member States to determine the formalities and inherent characteristics of the proceedings intended to render the requirements of Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665 effective, procedural specifications which fall outside its scope.

– Third: that of the aspects of substantive law which allow clarification of that liability, which are also obviously outside the scope of Directive 89/665.

b) The application of Article 2(7) of Directive 92/13

89. This perfectly defined framework, upon which European Union law has a bearing not in a direct way but by means of the principles of effectiveness and equivalence, may be understood as having been amended by Directive 92/13, if Article 2(7) thereof is regarded as incorporating certain guidelines for determining injury and its extent.

90. As we shall see, that is not quite true.

91. That provision raises the question whether it is possible to relate it to the requirements for the determination and extent of the damage for which Directive 89/665 guarantees compensation: in short, what is the significance to Directive 89/665 of that additional article in Directive 92/13?

92. To date, the Court has not ruled on that question.

93. Article 2(7) contains three elements which may be examined individually: first, a certain type of damage, that of the costs incurred in preparing a bid; second, the element of proof, limited to showing that there was, on the one hand, an infringement of European Union law and, on the other hand, a real chance of winning the contract, and; third, causation, meaning that, as a consequence of that infringement, that real chance of winning the contract was adversely affected.

94. Although public contracts in special sectors (water, energy, transport and postal services, governed by Directive 2004/17 (45)) differ, as regards their case-by-case approach and their nature, from contracts which may be concluded generally (governed by Directive 2004/18), it is difficult to identify reasons which justified regulation of compensation for damages, such as that being undertaken in this case, only in respect of the first and not for the second.

95. It must be pointed out that those two directives were amended by Directive 2007/66/EC (46) but that the Union legislature did not – taking advantage of that amendment – introduce in Directive 89/665 a provision similar to that in Article 2(7) of Directive 92/13, from which it may implicitly be inferred that the legislature did not wish to adopt such a provision with regard to the award of damages guaranteed by Directive 89/665, thereby intentionally leaving open the question of their determination.

96. As regards the extent of the damage to be compensated, it is obvious that Directive 89/665 leaves open that question, which, from the outset, presupposes that the Member States are free to incorporate both actual loss and loss of profit; however, it is equally true that Directive 92/13 does not restrict the autonomy of the States, since it governs only certain criteria on causation and proof for the purposes of facilitating compensation of the expenses incurred by a tenderer, but gives no guidance on the extent of the harm or the compensation or on the attribution of liability. The provision is limited to laying down a requirement for a legal line of argument – in the event that the European Union legislation is infringed – and more or less comprehensive proof concerning the probability of winning the contract. (47)

97. Accordingly, I am of the view that the relevance of Article 2(7) of Directive 92/13 must be qualified in this case. However, I consider that, neither legal certainty nor respect for the institutional balance would be adversely affected by the application to Directive 89/665, for interpretative purposes, of the elements of Article 2(7) of Directive 92/13 concerning causality and proof as regards the objective damage comprising the cost of participating in the tendering procedure, without thereby diminishing the freedom which, through procedural autonomy, European Union law confers on the Member States as to whether or not to require proof of causality (48) as regards any type of harm or its extent, or to consider harm other than that of costs alone, such as loss of profit.

c) Determination of the damage

98. Accordingly, the keys to Question 4(c), as regards the determination of damage, should be sought in the principle of the procedural autonomy of the Member States, which are responsible for determining the criteria for awarding the compensation provided for in Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665.

99. Directive 89/665 does not provide attribution criteria for the determination of injury; however, the Union must not remain absolutely detached, in so far as it must always ensure respect for the limits which I have described throughout this Opinion, represented by the needs of the principles of equivalence and effectiveness, as adequate safeguards of the right to effective protection by national courts of rights conferred by European Union law.

100. Thus, by way of an example, the parameter of effectiveness formed the basis of a ruling by the Court censuring the Portuguese Republic, (49) on account of the fact that, in its domestic legislation, it made the award of compensation for an infringement of European Union law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law subject to a requirement to show the existence of fault or fraud, a requirement which, according to the Court, did not represent an adequate system of judicial protection, because it created a risk that tenderers who had suffered injury might be deprived of the right to claim compensation or that there might be a delay in granting it. (50)

101. In another field, in T-Mobile Netherlands and Others, (51) the Court addressed the question of whether, in the context of Article 81(1) EC and in relation to 'examining whether there is a causal connection' between the concerted practice and the market conduct of the undertakings, the national court is required to apply the presumption that there is a causal connection in certain circumstances, (52) or whether, as regards the burden of proof, the national court was free to apply the rules of its national law: the Court supported the view that Article 81(1) EC contains a presumption of a causal connection which 'consequently forms an integral part of applicable Community law'.

102. The ruling in T-Mobile Netherlands and Others, which establishes at the level of European Union (competition) law the fact that a causal connection may be presumed to exist, contrasts with the judgment in ERG and Others, (53) which, for the purposes of the obligation to award compensation resulting from Directive 2004/35/EC, (54) after laying down proof of causation as a requirement for such an award, (55) none the less allows the Member States to introduce a presumption of a causal connection which must be based, it is true, on elements of plausible evidence set out in the actual judgment.

103. As has been seen, outside the field of public procurement, T-Mobile Netherlands and Others confirms the relevance of European Union law for the purposes of establishing the causal connection, despite the fact that, in accordance with the requirements of procedural autonomy it should be a matter for the Member States. There is no shortage of reasons for such a position, since Article 81 EC, that is to say a provision of primary law, is directly involved in the field of competition. (56) However, the nature of Article 81 EC differs profoundly from the provisions in a directive, hence, at the level of secondary law, the Court has shown that it is reluctant (in ERG and Others, for example) so directly to impinge upon such an inherently procedural issue.

104. However, on the basis of Directive 89/665, by means of the rule on the limits of procedural autonomy, the Court has, in the Commission v Portugal cases, inferred that a national rule on the attribution of liability, one which requires proof of fault or fraud, is unlawful, and therefore, from that perspective, I can see no obstacle to extending that idea to other national rules, such as, generally, those concerning evidence or determination of damage.

105. From the foregoing, and for the purpose of answering the sections of Questions 4 and 5 relating to the criteria for determining damage, it is possible to extract a principle, a specific reflection of the requirement of the effectiveness of European Union law: the principle that the burden of proof in respect of injury, for the purposes of Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665, cannot be so strict that it makes substantiating injury so difficult that the effectiveness of the provision is undermined.

d) The extent of the injury

106. Directive 89/665 also provides no guidelines on the elements which may be included in the concept of damage, so that all issues relating to the extent of the damage must be understood within the limits of national law.

107. Nevertheless, in certain circumstances, the Court has also laid down specific obligations, in particular in the field of competition, relating to the award of damages, so as to protect interests harmed by an infringement of European Union law.

108. For example, in Courage and Crehan, (57) the Court stated that the full effectiveness of Article 85 of the Treaty (now Article 101 TFEU) requires the award of damages for loss caused by a contract or by conduct liable to restrict or distort competition, and, in Manfredi and Others, held that, in view of the absence of relevant provisions of European Union law, 'it is for the domestic legal system of each Member State to set the criteria for determining the extent of the damages for harm caused … provided that the principles of equivalence and effectiveness are observed' (paragraph 98).

109. In Manfredi and Others, the Court considered that it is the 'right of any individual to seek compensation for loss caused by a contract or by conduct liable to restrict or distort competition', and made it clear that 'injured persons must be able to seek compensation not only for actual loss (damnum emergens) but also for loss of profit (lucrum cessans) plus interest' (paragraph 95).

110. Since it must, in practice, be possible to make reparation of damage in the case of a breach of European Union law, the total exclusion of loss of profit as a head of damage cannot be accepted. (58)

111. Even more obvious, in my view, is the need to include, in accordance with the applicable national rules, and for the purpose of effective compensation, the corresponding interest, since, as may be inferred from Marshall, (59) 'it constitutes an essential component of compensation.'

112. With a view to answering Questions 4 and 5, I suggest that the Court declare that, for the purposes of Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665, the criteria governing the determination and the extent of the damage to be made good, resulting from the infringement of European Union law on public procurement, must be determined under national law, although the principle of the effectiveness of European Union law requires that proof of injury should not be so strict that it makes substantiating injury so difficult that the effectiveness of that provision is undermined, that the corresponding interest must be included and, finally, that the possibility of taking into consideration loss of profit as a head of damage cannot be excluded.

VII – Conclusion

113. In view of the foregoing considerations, I suggest that the Court should:

(1) declare Question 1 inadmissible, and

(2) provide the following answer to the remaining questions raised by the Rechtbank:

(a) For the purposes of Question 2, Article 1(1) and (3) and Article 2(1) and (6) of Directive 89/665/EEC, to the extent that it has not been established that the effectiveness of that provision has been adversely affected, do not preclude national legislation providing for only one procedure for obtaining an interim measure, characterised by the fact that it is geared to their rapid adoption, that lawyers have no right to exchange views, that evidence is, as a rule, presented solely in written form and that statutory rules on evidence are not applicable (Question 2(a)), irrespective of whether the judicial decision adopting that interim measure does not lead to the final determination of the legal situation and does not form part of the process in which that legal situation is finally determined (Question 2(b)) or whether that decision is binding only on the parties to the proceedings (Question 2(c)).

(b) For the purposes of Question 3, Directive 89/665 does not prevent the judge dealing with interim relief proceedings from taking a differing view to that of the court dealing with the substantive proceedings on the main issue, provided that the national procedural system secures the results required by Directive 89/665 and, in particular, the coexistence of the three guarantees provided for in Article 2(1), as they have been interpreted in Community case-law.

(c) For the purposes of Questions 4 and 5:

– the Court should declare that it has no jurisdiction to give a ruling on who must be deemed liable in the national dispute.

– for the purposes of Article 2(1)(c) of Directive 89/665, the criteria governing the determination and the extent of the damage to be made good, resulting from the infringement of European Union law on public procurement, must be determined under national law, although the principle of the effectiveness of European Union law requires that proof of injury should not be so strict that it makes substantiating it so difficult that the effectiveness of that provision is undermined, the corresponding interest must be included and, finally, the possibility of taking into consideration loss of profit cannot be excluded.

Similarly, the Combinatie was notified that, following a thorough re-examination of MFE's tender, the conclusion had been reached that the contract could not be awarded to it and that the possibility of a fresh call for tenders was therefore under consideration.

10 – Provision worded in accordance with Article 41 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1). Pursuant to Article 33 of Council Directive 93/36/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 1), to Article 36 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54) and to the second paragraph of Article 82 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114), and in accordance with the correlation tables annexed to those directives, references to Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC and 92/50/EEC contained in Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 are to be construed as references to Directive 2004/18.

12 – The explanatory memorandum to the Raamwet EEG-voorschriften aanbestedingen, een kaderwet voor de implementatie van communautaire aanbestedingsregels (Framework law for the application of Community rules on public procurement ('the Raamwet') confirms that view by stating that 'the implementation of [Directive 89/665/EEC] does not require changes to the regulations. … The review procedures which must be available to interested parties under the directive already exist within the Netherlands legal system'.

13 – This may be inferred from the case-law of the Raad van State (Council of State).

---

14 – Inter alia, the decision to award the contract to a given tenderer.

---

15 – As follows from the Raamwet and Article 8(3) of the Algemene Wet Bestuursrecht ('General Law on Administrative Law'), it is not possible to appeal to an (administrative) court against prior decisions taken by a public authority in preparation for a legal act governed by private law.

---

16 – Not even in the case of contracting authorities' preliminary decisions, such as the award decision.

---

17 – According to the observations of the Netherlands Government, the administrative courts may, however, have jurisdiction where, exceptionally, specific legislation confers jurisdiction on them, as occurs in the case of concessions on the basis of the Wet Personenvervoer of 2000 (Law of 2000 on the transport of persons).

---

---

19 – From the outset, Question 1(b) and (c) are somewhat contradictory, since although section (b) states that 'the administrative courts [are] confined to forming an opinion and ruling on the tendering decision' section (c) states that the General Law on Administrative Law excludes 'such applications in the case of decisions concerning the conclusion of a contract by the contracting authority with one of the tenderers'.

---

20 – In the Netherlands the administrative court has no jurisdiction over aspects concerning public procurement. Powers of review extend only to certain public concessions, which generally fall within the scope of administrative law and are very common in the sphere of public property and services. That exception is referred to in the explanatory memorandum to the General Law on Administrative Law, as pointed out by the Netherlands Government, which, in order to prevent undesired conflicts opposed the parallel jurisdiction of the two systems of courts.

---

25 – Aspects in respect of which the Court must not rule in abstracto.

---

26 – Article 2(1)(a). Emphasis added. Moreover, Article 2(4) of Directive 89/665 provides that a Member State, at the time it authorises those measures, may strike a balance between 'the probable consequences of the measures for all interests likely to be harmed, as well as the public interest, and may decide not to grant such measures where their negative consequences could exceed their benefits.' Furthermore, although the same paragraph states that '[a] decision not to grant interim measures shall not prejudice any other claim of the person seeking these measures', it does not establish the procedural means whereby they may be upheld.

27 – For example, in Case C-236/95 Commission v Greece [1996] ECR I-4459, paragraph 11, and Case C-214/00 Commission v Spain [2003] ECR I-4667, paragraph 98, from which it is clear that it must be possible to take interim measures, independently of any prior action.

28 – Emphasis added.

---

29 – The reformulations of that question proposed by the Commission and the Netherlands, namely whether Directive 89/665 is infringed where the judge dealing with proceedings for interim relief applies European Union law in a way which, subsequently, the court dealing with the substance regards as incorrect, would be easy to answer, since, clearly, on the basis of distinguishing between the procedural rules contained in Directive 89/665 – concerning review guarantees – and the substantive rules on public procurement, an interim measure which is based on a misinterpretation of the applicable substantive law does not in itself entail infringement of Directive 89/665.

30 – Case C-30/93 AC-ATEL Electronics Vertriebs [1994] ECR I-2305, paragraphs 16 and 17, and Case C-107/98 Teckal [1999] ECR I-8121, paragraphs 29 and 30.

---

31 – In order to establish that 'misinterpretation' the Court would have to unravel elements which it is solely for the national court to assess.

32 – Case C-320/88 Shipping and Forwarding Enterprise Safe [1990] ECR I-285, paragraph 11.

33 – There are procedural systems, such as the Spanish system, in which those changes are made automatically, the issue of a final judgment sufficing in that regard.

---

34 – In particular in its clarifications (paragraph 18 et seq.) to the questions put by the Court. After explaining that the Netherlands legal system draws a distinction between, first, the decision – of administrative law – to award the contract and, secondly, the act of private law whereby that award is effected – the conclusion of the contract –, it emphatically states that neither the first nor the second may be the subject-matter of an action to set it aside.

35 – Case C-81/98 Alcatel Austria and Others [1999] ECR I-7671, paragraphs 35, 37, 38 and 43.

36 – The Netherlands Government has emphasised throughout its observations that – as already stated – the administrative court has no jurisdiction to set aside the contract award decision, since that decision is merely an element prior to the private act. However, the civil court is also unable to set aside the award decision, since it was taken by a public authority. Nevertheless, the fact is that even the civil courts are unable to hear any action to set aside the conclusion of the contract (an act governed by private law): as is clear from paragraph 20 of its clarifications, the case-law of the Hoge Raad precludes such review and, except in special circumstances, a contract cannot be challenged on the ground that it is incompatible with the legislation on public procurement, on the basis that no legal standing is conferred on any person who might challenge legal defects in the contract or the prior procedure, that is an excluded tenderer, since he is not a party to the contract from the point of view of private law.

37 – Moreover, none of the parties has raised this issue.

---

38 – Although it would have been difficult for it to 'revoke, uphold or amend' the interim measures, because, as I have stated above, the objectives and claims in the two proceedings were different and could also affect different parties.

---

39 – According to the Rechtbank, the above problem would not arise 'if the decision could be contested in only one specific tendering procedure before one court and if, for damages to be awarded, it were to be determined that the contested decision must first be set aside by the competent authority'.

---

40 – In order to do so, it must take into account all the factors which characterise the situation which has been brought before it, 'in particular, the degree of clarity and precision of the rule infringed, whether the infringement was intentional, whether the error of law was excusable or inexcusable, the position taken, where applicable, by a Community institution and non-compliance by the court in question with its obligation to make a reference for a preliminary ruling under … Article [267 TFEU]' (Case C-224/01 Köbler [2003] ECR I-10239, paragraph 55), a sufficiently serious infringement of European Union law occurring 'where the decision concerned was made in manifest breach of the case-law of the Court in the matter' (Joined Cases C-46/93 and C-48/93 Brasserie du pêcheur and Factortame [1996] ECR I-1029, paragraph 57, and Köbler, paragraph 56.)

---

41 – Provided that the requirements set out in the settled case-law of the Court have been fulfilled: that the rule of European Union law infringed is intended to confer rights upon them, that the breach of that rule is sufficiently serious and that there is a direct causal link between that breach and the damage sustained.

---

42 – Which cannot, for these purposes, make less favourable provision for infringements of European Union law than for infringements of domestic rules (principle of equivalence) nor be so framed as to make it, in practice, impossible or excessively difficult to obtain reparation (principle of equivalence) (see Köbler, paragraph 58, and Case C-524/04 Test Claimants in the Thin Cap Group Litigation [2007] ECR I-2107, paragraph 123).

43 – It is sufficient to refer, for example, to cases of liability for damage caused in the course of medical treatment deemed to fall short of the state of the art.

44 – Case C-103/97 Köllensperger and Atzwanger [1999] ECR I-551, paragraph 3, and the judgment of 14 October 2004 in Case C-275/03 Commission v Portugal, not published in the ECR, paragraph 28.

46 – Directive of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 December 2007 amending Council Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC with regard to improving the effectiveness of review procedures concerning the award of public contracts (OJ 2007 L 335, p. 31).

47 – However, as regards the criteria for determining the damage, the underlying simplicity of Article 2(7) makes it similar to the Court's finding in the judgment in Commission v Portugal in which, although the Court did not actually give a ruling as to the existence of strict liability, the manner in which it sets out the criteria for determining damage seems from a practical point of view, effectively to boil down to a finding of infringement of European Union.

48 – In that regard, on the basis of the principle of equivalence – albeit in the field of competition – in Joined Cases C-295/04 to C-298/04 Manfredi and Others [2006] ECR I-6619, paragraph 99, the Court stated that 'if it is possible to award specific damages, such as exemplary or punitive damages, in domestic actions similar to actions founded on the Community … rules, it must also be possible to award such damages in actions founded on Community rules', although that does not prevent 'national courts from taking steps to ensure that the protection of the rights guaranteed by Community law does not entail the unjust enrichment of those who enjoy them'.

---

50 – In Case C-70/06 Commission v Portugal [2008] ECR I-1, the second of the series, in which the Portuguese Republic was censured for failing to take the measures necessary to comply with the judgment of 14 October 2004 in Case C-275/03, the Court further warned that the furnishing of proof of fault or fraud, although it does not render it impossible for individuals to bring judicial actions, 'would appear, none the less … to render those actions more difficult and costly, so impairing the full effectiveness of the Community's public procurement policy', paragraph 42.

59 – Case C-271/91 Marshall [1993] ECR I-4367, paragraph 31, from which it may be inferred that the need for effective reparation for loss or damage also constitutes a requirement in fields other than competition, since Marshall was concerned with damage suffered as a result of discriminatory dismissal.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Third Chamber)

28 January 2010 (*)

(Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations – Directive 93/37/EEC – Public works contracts – Notification to candidates and tenderers of decisions awarding contracts – Directive 89/665/EEC – Procedures for review of the award of public contracts – Period within which actions for review must be brought – Date from which the period for bringing an action starts to run)

ACTION under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, brought on 20 October 2008,

European Commission, represented by G. Zavvos, M. Konstantinidis and E. White, acting as Agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg, applicant,

v

Ireland, represented by D. O'Hagan, acting as Agent, and by A. Collins SC, with an address for service in Luxembourg, defendant,

THE COURT (Third Chamber),

composed of J.N. Cunha Rodrigues (Rapporteur), President of the Second Chamber, acting for the President of the Third Chamber, P. Lindh, A. Rosas, U. Lõhmus and A. Ó Caoimh, Judges,

Advocate General: J. Kokott,

Registrar: R. Şereş, Administrator,

having regard to the written procedure and further to the hearing on 24 September 2009,

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 29 October 2009,

Judgment

1 By its application, the Commission of the European Communities asks the Court to declare that, by reason of the rules on time-limits in the national legislation regulating the exercise of the right of tenderers to judicial review in public procurement procedures and by failing to notify the award decision to the complainant in the procurement procedure in question, Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations, concerning the applicable time-limits, under Article 1(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33), as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1) ('Directive 89/665'), as interpreted by the Court, and, concerning the lack of notification, under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, as interpreted by the Court, and Article 8(2) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54), as amended by European Parliament and Council Directive 97/52/EC of 13 October 1997 (OJ 1997 L 328, p. 1) ('Directive 93/37').

Legal context

Community legislation

2 Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 provides:

‘The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of [Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682)], [Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1977 L 13, p. 1)], and [Directive] 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7), on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.’

3 Under Article 2(1) of Directive 89/665:

‘The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.’

4 Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37 provides:

‘Contracting authorities shall promptly inform candidates and tenderers of the decisions taken on contract awards, including the reasons why they have decided not to award a contract for which there has been an invitation to tender or to start the procedure again, and shall do so in writing if requested. They shall also inform the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities of such decisions.’

National legislation

5 Order 84A(4) of the Rules of the Superior Courts, in the version resulting from Statutory Instrument N° 374 of 1998 (‘the RSC’), provides that:

‘An application for the review of a decision to award or the award of a public contract shall be made at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the application first arose unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending such period.’

Background to the dispute and pre-litigation procedure

6 The National Roads Authority (‘the NRA’) is a public authority responsible for the construction and maintenance of roads in Ireland.

7 SIAC Construction Limited (‘SIAC’) is a limited liability company established in Ireland, which carries on business in the construction sector.

8 The NRA published a call for interest in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 10 July 2001 to design, build, finance and operate the Dundalk Western Bypass. The contractor was required to establish a public-private partnership with the NRA and to operate that section of motorway for approximately 30 years.

9 In December 2001, four candidates were invited to proceed to negotiations.

10 Of those four candidates, two were selected in April 2003 to proceed to more intensive negotiations: these were a consortium called EuroLink, of which SIAC formed part, and a consortium called Celtic Roads Group ('CRG').

11 On 8 August 2003, the NRA invited EuroLink and CRG to submit a best and final offer.

12 By letter of 14 October 2003, EuroLink was informed that the NRA had decided to designate CRG as the preferred tenderer. That letter from the NRA pointed out that this was not a rejection of the offer submitted by EuroLink. The letter explained that the NRA would proceed with discussions with CRG, potentially leading to the award of the contract for the project in question. However, if such discussions were to terminate without a contract being awarded, the NRA reserved the right to invite EuroLink to enter into discussions with it in place of CRG.

13 On 9 December 2003, the NRA decided to award the contract in question to CRG.

14 On 5 February 2004, the NRA signed the contract with CRG. A notice to that effect was displayed on the NRA website on 9 February 2004. The contract award notice was published in the Official Journal of the European Union on 3 April 2004.

15 On 8 April 2004, SIAC brought an action for damages before the High Court of Ireland. It complained, inter alia, first, of the selection of the negotiated procedure and, secondly, of certain irregularities which, in its view, had occurred at the stage of introducing and evaluating the best and final offers. With regard to limitation periods, SIAC claimed that the date on which the period for bringing an action began to run was the date on which the contract with CRG was signed, that is to say, 5 February 2004.

16 The High Court took the view that the relevant grounds for bringing the action arose on the date on which the consortium to which SIAC belonged was informed of the identity of the preferred tenderer, namely 14 October 2003. SIAC, it ruled, ought to have brought its action no later than three months after that date, in accordance with Order 84A of the RSC. The High Court, by its judgment of 16 July 2004, accordingly dismissed SIAC's action as being out of time.

17 SIAC submitted a complaint to the Commission. The latter sent a letter of formal notice to Ireland on 10 April 2006, to which that Member State replied on 30 May 2006.

18 On 15 December 2006, the Commission sent an additional letter of formal notice to Ireland, which replied on 21 February 2007.

19 As it was not satisfied by the explanations which it had received, the Commission sent Ireland a reasoned opinion on 1 February 2008, inviting that Member State to take the measures necessary for compliance within a period of two months. Ireland replied to that reasoned opinion on 25 June 2008.

20 As it considered that reply to be unsatisfactory, the Commission brought the present action.

The action

The first head of claim

21 By its first head of claim, the Commission alleges that the NRA did not inform the unsuccessful tenderer of its decision awarding the contract for the design, construction, financing and operation of the Dundalk Western Bypass.

Arguments of the parties

22 The Commission submits that notification of the public contract award decision to the unsuccessful candidates and tenderers is required under Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37. It also submits that, in the context of Directive 89/665, complete legal protection presupposes an obligation to inform candidates and tenderers of the award decision.

23 The communication to EuroLink, by letter from the NRA of 14 October 2003, of the fact that CRG had been designated as the preferred tenderer was not, the Commission contends, tantamount to a rejection of the offer submitted by EuroLink. That letter cannot therefore be regarded as constituting the notification of the award decision provided for in Directive 89/665 and in Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37.

24 Since it is common ground that SIAC did not receive notification of the final award of the contract at issue, the requirements of those provisions were not complied with.

25 Ireland accepts the obligation on Member States to ensure prompt notification to candidates and tenderers of decisions taken on contract awards. It argues that it has faithfully transposed Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37, which lays down that obligation, into its domestic legal order. The Commission, moreover, is not claiming that the relevant Irish legislation does not comply with the requirements of Community law.

26 With regard to the contract relating to the Dundalk motorway bypass, Ireland accepts that communication of the preferred tenderer to EuroLink on 14 October 2003 does not constitute notification of the decision to award the contract.

27 Ireland claims, however, that, as is apparent from the judgment of the High Court of Ireland of 16 July 2004, it was, as of 14 October 2003, clear to SIAC that a decision had been taken to award the contract. SIAC must have been aware that the NRA was engaged in the process necessary to conclude a contract with CRG. In Ireland's view it follows that, in the circumstances of the present case, no injustice was caused by the lack of notification of the final decision to award the contract.

28 Ireland submits that, as its national law faithfully transposes the Community rules on notification of decisions concerning the award of public contracts, Ireland cannot be considered to have failed in its obligations under Community law on the basis of a single incident of non-notification.

Findings of the Court

29 Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37 requires contracting authorities to inform candidates and tenderers promptly of the decisions taken on contract awards. Notification to unsuccessful candidates and tenderers of the public contract award decision is mandatory under that provision.

30 That same obligation also arises under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, inasmuch as the possibility of bringing an effective action against award decisions can be ensured only if all candidates or tenderers are informed in good time of those decisions (see, to that effect, judgment of 24 June 2004 in Case C-212/02 Commission v Austria, paragraph 21, and Case C-444/06 Commission v Spain [2008] ECR I-2045, paragraph 38).

31 It is not disputed that in the present case the NRA never officially informed EuroLink of its decision to award the contract in question to CRG.

32 The announcement of the award on the NRA's website on 9 February 2004 and the publication thereof on 3 April 2004 in the Official Journal of the European Union cannot adequately rectify that failure.

33 That information was released into the public domain after the signature of the contract on 5 February 2004. In order to make effective legal protection possible for the candidates or tenderers, however, they ought to have been informed of the NRA's award decision in good time before the contract was concluded (see, to that effect, Commission v Austria, paragraph 21, and Commission v Spain, paragraph 38).

34 The NRA thus failed in its obligations under Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37 and Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 to provide information in regard to the contract in question.

35 Referring in this connection to the NRA's letter of 14 October 2003, Ireland submits that in the present case SIAC nevertheless did not suffer any injustice. In its view, after that date, SIAC must have been aware that the NRA was in the process of signing a contract with CRG.

36 That argument cannot be accepted.

37 First of all, the NRA did not, by its letter of 14 October 2003, notify the definitive decision to award the contract in question. It merely indicated that it had selected CRG as the preferred tenderer. The NRA even stated that, in the event that the discussions between it and CRG did not lead to the award of a contract, it reserved the right to enter into discussions with EuroLink in place of CRG. At that stage, Eurolink had not been definitively ruled out as a potential candidate for the contract and could legitimately take the view that the procedure for the award of that contract had not been completed.

38 Secondly, and in any event, the finding that a Member State has failed to fulfil its obligations is not bound up with a finding as to the damage flowing from that failure (Case C-263/96 Commission v Belgium [1997] ECR I-7453, paragraph 30, and Joined Cases C-20/01 and C-28/01 Commission v Germany [2003] ECR I-3609, paragraph 42).

39 Lastly, Ireland argues that the national legislation at issue satisfies the information obligations which are imposed by the Community legislation. In those circumstances, a single incident of failure to notify a decision concerning the award of a public contract cannot justify a finding that the Member State in question has failed to fulfil its obligations under Community law.

40 That argument also cannot be accepted.

41 Without its being necessary to rule on the assertion that the national legislation at issue transposes adequately the relevant requirements of Community law, suffice it to recall that, according to settled case-law, an action for failure to fulfil obligations makes possible not only an examination of the compatibility of a Member State's laws, regulations and administrative provisions with Community law but also a determination that there has been an infringement of Community law by the national bodies in a specific individual case (see, concerning the award of public contracts, Joined Cases C-20/01 and C-28/01 Commission v Germany, paragraph 30, and judgment of 15 October 2009 in Case C-275/08 Commission v Germany, paragraph 27).

42 It follows that the first head of claim is well founded.

The second head of claim

43 The Commission's second head of claim consists of two parts. First, the Commission argues that the national legislation in question gives rise to uncertainty as to which decision must be challenged through legal proceedings. It maintains, secondly, that that legislation is unclear on how periods within which proceedings must be brought are to be determined.

The first part of the second head of claim

44 The Commission states that it is difficult for tenderers to know which decision by the contracting authority they have to challenge and on which date the period for challenging that decision begins to run. The Commission argues that that uncertainty is attributable to the wording of Order 84A(4) of the RSC and its uncertain interpretation.

45 The Commission asserts that the expression 'a decision to award or the award of a public contract' used in Order 84A(4) of the RSC refers to decisions which may be challenged and that that provision makes no reference to earlier interim decisions taken by the contracting authority. In its judgment of 16 July 2004, the High Court took the view that that provision applies not only to the decision to award a contract or to the award of such a contract, but also to decisions taken by contracting authorities in respect of public procurement procedures.

46 In the Commission's view, the national legislation in question appears not to be in line with the fundamental principle of legal certainty and the requirement of effectiveness envisaged by Directive 89/665, which is an application of that principle, since tenderers are left in uncertainty as to their situation when they intend to bring an action against an award decision taken by a contracting authority in a two-stage procedure in which the final award decision is taken after a tenderer has been selected.

47 The Commission argues that it must be made clear to tenderers whether Order 84A(4) of the RSC applies not only to decisions to award contracts, but also to interim decisions taken by a contracting authority during the tendering procedure, including those concerning the selection of the preferred tenderer.

48 Ireland points out that Article 1 of Directive 89/665 requires Member States to ensure that there are effective legal remedies against all decisions taken by contracting authorities in public procurement procedures and not only against decisions to award contracts in those procedures. In Ireland's view, the Irish courts interpret and apply Order 84A(4) of the RSC in accordance with those requirements. The High Court's judgment of 16 July 2004 in particular states clearly that that provision allows proceedings to be brought against any decision taken by contracting authorities in a public procurement procedure, which is entirely consistent with Article 1 of Directive 89/665.

49 With regard to the date from which the period for challenging an interim decision by a contracting authority begins to run, Ireland observes that Directive 89/665 requires that it be possible for decisions taken by contracting authorities to be reviewed rapidly. An application can be examined expeditiously only if both parties to the dispute are obliged to act quickly in the relevant proceedings. That objective could not be attained if the parties were allowed to await formal notification of the award decision before bringing proceedings, even though they have all the elements of fact and law necessary for bringing such an action.

50 Ireland submits that, if a tenderer could simply await notification of a formal decision not to award it the contract in question, despite knowing that it was not going to be awarded the contract, as found by the High Court in the case which gave rise to its judgment of 16 July 2004, significant delay would ensue for the review of all decisions by contracting authorities.

– Findings of the Court

51 The Court has already held that Directive 89/665 does not preclude national legislation which provides that any application for review of a contracting authority's decision must be commenced within a period laid down to that effect and that any irregularity in the award procedure relied upon in support of such application must be raised within the same period, if it is not to be out of time, with the result that, when that period has passed, it is no longer possible to challenge such a decision or to raise such an irregularity, provided that the period in question is reasonable (Case C-241/06 Lämmerzahl [2007] ECR I-8415, paragraph 50 and case-law cited).

52 That case-law is based on the consideration that the full implementation of the objective sought by Directive 89/665 would be undermined if candidates and tenderers were allowed to invoke, at any stage of the award procedure, infringements of the rules of public procurement, thereby obliging the contracting authority to restart the entire procedure in order to correct such infringements (Lämmerzahl, paragraph 51).

53 On the other hand, national limitation periods, including the detailed rules for their application, should not in themselves be such as to render virtually impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of any rights which the person concerned derives from Community law (Lämmerzahl, paragraph 52).

54 Order 84A(4) of the RSC provides that 'an application for the review of a decision to award or the award of a public contract' must be made within a specified period.

55 However, as occurred in the dispute which gave rise to the High Court's judgment of 16 July 2004, the Irish courts may interpret that provision as applying not only to the final decision to award a public contract but also to interim decisions taken by a contracting authority during the course of that public procurement procedure. If the final decision to award a contract is taken after expiry of the period laid down for challenging the relevant interim decision, the possibility cannot be excluded that an interested candidate or tenderer might find itself out of time and thus prevented from bringing an action challenging the award of the contract in question.

56 According to the Court's settled case-law, the application of a national limitation period must not lead to the exercise of the right to review of decisions to award public contracts being deprived of its practical effectiveness (see, to that effect, Case C-470/99 Universale-Bau and Others [2002] ECR I-11617, paragraph 72; Case C-327/00 Santex [2003] ECR I-1877, paragraphs 51 and 57; and Lämmerzahl, paragraph 52).

57 As observed by the Advocate General in point 51 of her Opinion, only if it is clear beyond doubt from the national legislation that even preparatory acts or interim decisions of contracting authorities at issue in public procurement cases start the limitation period running can tenderers and candidates take the necessary precautions to have possible breaches of procurement law reviewed effectively within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 and to avoid their challenges being statute-barred.

58 Accordingly, it is not compatible with the requirements of Article 1(1) of that directive if the scope of the period laid down in Order 84A(4) of the RSC is extended to cover the review of interim decisions taken by contracting authorities in public procurement procedures without that being clearly expressed in the wording thereof.

59 Ireland disagrees with this finding, contending that the application of such a period for challenging interim decisions corresponds to the objectives of Directive 89/665, in particular the requirement of rapid action.

60 It is true that Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires Member States to ensure that decisions taken by contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and as rapidly as possible. In order to attain the objective of rapidity pursued by that directive, Member States may impose limitation periods for actions in order to require traders to challenge promptly preliminary measures or interim decisions taken in public procurement procedures (see, to that effect, Universale-Bau and Others, paragraphs 75 to 79; Case C-230/02 Grossmann Air Service [2004] ECR I-1829, paragraphs 30 and 36 to 39; and Lämmerzahl, paragraphs 50 and 51).

61 However, the objective of rapidity pursued by Directive 89/665 must be achieved in national law in compliance with the requirements of legal certainty. To that end, Member States have an obligation to create a legal situation that is sufficiently precise, clear and foreseeable to enable individuals to ascertain their rights and obligations (see, to that effect, Case C-361/88 Commission v Germany [1991] ECR I-2567, paragraph 24, and Case C-221/94 Commission v Luxembourg [1996] ECR I-5669, paragraph 22).

62 The abovementioned objective of rapidity does not permit Member States to disregard the principle of effectiveness, under which the detailed methods for the application of national limitation periods must not render impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of any rights which the person concerned derives from Community law, a principle which underlies the objective of ensuring effective review proceedings laid down in Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665.

63 The extension of the limitation period under Order 84A(4) of the RSC to interim decisions taken by contracting authorities in public procurement procedures in a manner which deprives the parties concerned of their right of review satisfies neither the requirements of legal certainty nor the objective of effective review. Interested parties must be informed of the application of limitation periods to interim decisions with sufficient clarity to enable them effectively to bring proceedings within the periods laid down. The failure to provide such information cannot be justified on grounds of procedural rapidity.

64 Ireland submits that the Irish courts interpret and apply Order 84A(4) of the RSC in conformity with the requirements of Directive 89/665. This argument refers to the significant role played by case-law in common-law countries such as Ireland.

65 It should be noted in this regard that, according to the Court's settled case-law, although the transposition of a directive into domestic law does not necessarily require the provisions of the directive to be reproduced in precisely the same words in a specific, express provision of national law and a general legal context may be sufficient, it is nevertheless necessary that that legal context be sufficiently clear and precise as to enable the parties concerned to be fully informed of their rights and, if necessary, avail themselves of those rights before the national courts (judgment of 29 October 2009 in Case C-474/08 Commission v Belgium, paragraph 19 and case-law cited).

66 Order 84A(4) of the RSC, however, does not satisfy those requirements inasmuch as it allows national courts to apply, by analogy, the limitation period which it provides for challenges to public contract award decisions to challenges to interim decisions taken by contracting authorities in the course of those procurement procedures, in respect of which no express provision was made by the legislature for that limitation period to apply. The resulting legal situation is not sufficiently clear and precise to exclude the risk that concerned candidates and tenderers may be deprived of their right to challenge decisions in public procurement matters handed down by a national court on the basis of its own interpretation of that provision.

67 It follows that the first part of the second head of claim is well founded.

The second part of the second head of claim

– Arguments of the parties

68 The Commission points out that Order 84A(4) of the RSC requires actions to be brought 'at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months'. The Commission takes the view that that formulation leaves tenderers in uncertainty when they consider exercising their right under Community law to bring proceedings against a decision of a contracting authority. Indeed, tenderers would discover what interpretation will be given to the formulation 'at the earliest opportunity' only after their action has been brought and the competent court has exercised its discretion in interpreting that provision. Such a situation runs counter to the principle of legal certainty.

69 That provision, it continues, also creates a further uncertainty as to the question of the cases in which the three-month limitation period will be applied, and as to that of the other cases in which that period will be shorter because it was possible to bring an action at an earlier opportunity.

70 The Commission accordingly submits that Order 84A(4) of the RSC lacks clarity and gives rise to legal uncertainty. The Commission considers that, in view of the obligation to respect the principle of legal certainty, the applicable period has to be a fixed one which can be interpreted in a clear and foreseeable manner by all tenderers.

71 Ireland replies that, to date, no Irish court has dismissed, as being out of time, any action challenging a decision of a contracting authority made in the course of a public contract award procedure which was brought within the three-month limitation period but not at the earliest opportunity. Ireland takes the view that any such interpretation could not be upheld, since the expression 'in any event' indicates that any action brought within three months will be within time. Moreover the High Court of Ireland has expressly held that, where appropriate, the three-month limitation period will be extended.

72 Ireland observes that Order 84A(4) of the RSC gives the Irish courts the discretion to extend the period within which proceedings must be brought. The grant of discretion to a court by a legislative provision is a legitimate option available to the Member States when regulating periods for bringing proceedings. The Member States are not obliged to establish immutable limitation periods.

– Findings of the Court

73 Since Directive 89/665 pursues an objective of rapid action, it is legitimate for a Member State, in implementing that directive, to require interested parties to be diligent in bringing actions for review.

74 However, the wording of Order 84A(4) of the RSC, which provides that all relevant applications 'shall be made at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months' gives rise to uncertainty. The possibility cannot be ruled out that such a provision empowers national courts to dismiss an action as being out of time even before the expiry of the three-month period if those courts take the view that the application was not made 'at the earliest opportunity' within the terms of that provision.

75 It is not possible for parties concerned to predict what the limitation period will be if this is left to the discretion of the competent court. It follows that a national provision providing for such a period does not ensure effective transposition of Directive 89/665.

76 Ireland asserts, by way of reply to such a inference, that no Irish court has dismissed an action relating to public procurement as being out of time on the ground that it was not brought 'at the earliest opportunity'.

77 Suffice it to point out in this regard that, in order to determine whether a directive has been adequately transposed, it is not always necessary to establish the actual effects of the legislation transposing it into national law; the situation is different if the legislation itself harbours the insufficiencies of transposition (see, to that effect, Case C-392/96 Commission v Ireland [1999] ECR I-5901, paragraph 60).

78 Ireland explains that Order 84A(4) of the RSC confers discretion on the Irish courts to extend the periods for bringing proceedings.

79 That provision provides for the application of the period laid down therein 'unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending such period'.

80 Admittedly, such a provision in itself, independently of its context, must be recognised as a valid implementation of Directive 89/665. In a field such as public procurement, in which procedures can be complex and the facts may vary widely, the opportunity granted by the national legislature to national courts to extend, on grounds of fairness, the periods within which actions must be brought may be in the interests of the proper administration of justice.

81 However, the possibility for national courts to extend periods for bringing actions, as provided for in Order 84A(4) of the RSC, is not such as to compensate for the shortcomings in that provision, having regard to the clarity and precision which Directive 89/665 requires in respect of the system of limitation periods. Even if the candidate or tenderer concerned takes into account the possibility that periods may be extended, it will still not be able to predict with certainty which period will be accorded to it for the purpose of bringing proceedings, in view of the reference to the obligation to bring an action at the earliest opportunity.

82 Consequently, the second part of the second head of claim is well founded.

83 In the light of the foregoing, it must be held that,

– by reason of the fact that the NRA did not inform the unsuccessful tenderer of its decision to award the contract for the design, construction, financing and operation of the Dundalk Western Bypass, and

– by maintaining in force Order 84A(4) of the RSC, in so far as it gives rise to uncertainty as to which decision must be challenged through legal proceedings and as to how periods for bringing an action are to be determined,

Ireland has failed – as regards the first head of claim – to fulfil its obligations under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 and Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37 and – as regards the second head of claim – to fulfil its obligations under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665.

Costs

84 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has applied for costs to be awarded against Ireland and the latter has been unsuccessful, Ireland must be ordered to pay the costs.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby:

1. Declares that:

– by reason of the fact that the National Roads Authority did not inform the unsuccessful tenderer of its decision to award the contract for the design, construction, financing and operation of the Dundalk Western Bypass, and

– by maintaining in force Order 84A(4) of the Rules of the Superior Courts, in the version resulting from Statutory Instrument N° 374 of 1998, in so far as it gives rise to uncertainty as to which decision must be challenged through legal proceedings and as to how periods for bringing an action are to be determined,

Ireland has failed – as regards the first head of claim – to fulfil its obligations under Article 1(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992, and Article 8(2) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, as amended by European Parliament and Council Directive 97/52/EC of 13 October 1997 and – as regards the second head of claim – to fulfil its obligations under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50;

2. Orders Ireland to pay the costs.

KOKOTT
delivered on 29 October 2009 1

Case C-456/08

Commission of the European Communities
Ireland

(Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations – Public works contracts – Directives 93/37/EEC and 89/665/EEC – Obligation of the contracting authority to inform an unsuccessful tenderer of the award decision – Review procedures under national law – Effective legal protection – Decisions open to challenge – Limitation periods – Length of the period – Requirement to bring proceedings 'at the earliest opportunity')

I – Introduction

1. This action for failure to fulfil obligations gives the Court an opportunity to develop its case-law on the remedies available to unsuccessful tenderers in public procurement procedures.

2. First, the Commission criticises Ireland on the ground that in a specific individual case an Irish authority, awarding a road construction project, did not inform the unsuccessful consortium of tenderers of the final award decision.

3. Second, the Commission and Ireland dispute whether the time-limits laid down in Irish procedural law are formulated sufficiently clearly, precisely and predictably to enable effective review of the decisions of contracting authorities.

4. As regards the second issue, the present case has points of contact with Case C-406/08 Uniplex (UK), in which I also deliver my Opinion today.

II – Legal context

A – Community law

5. The Community law context of the present case is defined by Directives 93/37/EEC (2) and 89/665/EEC. (3)

6. Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37, as amended by Directive 97/52/EC, (4) contains the following provision:

'Contracting authorities shall promptly inform candidates and tenderers of the decisions taken on contract awards, including the reasons why they have decided not to award a contract for which there has been an invitation to tender or to start the procedure again, and shall do so in writing if requested. They shall also inform the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities of such decisions.'

7. Article 1 of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50/EEC, (5) (6) provides:

‘1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC, and 92/50/EEC … decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or nation[al] rules implementing that law.

2. Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings claiming injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.’ (7)

B – National law

8. As regards national law, first the Irish European Communities (Award of Public Authorities’ Contracts) Regulations 2006 (8) (‘the APAC Regulations’) and second the Irish Rules of the Superior Courts (9) (‘the RSC’) are relevant to the present case.

9. Regulation 49 of the APAC Regulations reads, in extract, as follows:

‘(1) As soon as practicable after reaching a decision about entering into a public contract or framework agreement or admission to a dynamic purchasing system, a contracting authority shall inform candidates and tenderers of the decision by the most rapid means of communication possible (such as by electronic mail or by telefax). …

(5) A contracting authority shall not enter into a public contract with a successful tenderer unless at least 14 days have elapsed since the date on which tenderers were informed of the contract award decision in accordance with paragraph (1).

10. Order 84A(4) of the RSC (10) provides as follows:

‘An application for the review of a decision to award or the award of a public contract shall be made at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the application first arose unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending such period.’

III – Facts and pre-litigation procedure

11. The Irish National Roads Authority (‘NRA’) is an authority responsible for the construction and maintenance of roads in Ireland.

12. On 10 July 2001 the NRA published in the Official Journal of the European Communities a call for interest in the design, building, financing and operation of the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway. The contractor was to establish a public-private partnership (11) with the NRA and operate the motorway for a period expected to be 30 years.

13. In December 2001 the NRA invited four interested parties to proceed to negotiations. In April 2003 the NRA selected two of them to proceed to more intensive negotiations, namely the EuroLink consortium and the Celtic Roads Group consortium. On 8 August 2003 the NRA invited those consortia to submit a ‘best and final offer’.

14. By letter of 14 October 2003, EuroLink was informed by the NRA that it had decided to select Celtic Roads Group as the preferred tenderer. The letter pointed out, however, that EuroLink’s offer had not been rejected. If the further discussions with Celtic Roads Group did not lead to the award of a contract, the NRA reserved the right to invite EuroLink to enter into discussions with it in place of Celtic Roads Group.

15. On 9 December 2003 the NRA decided to award the contract to Celtic Roads Group. The contract was signed on 5 February 2004. From 9 February 2004 a notice to that effect was displayed on the NRA website, and a notice of the award was also published in the Official Journal of the European Union on 3 April 2004.

16. On 8 April 2004 SIAC Construction Limited (‘SIAC’), an undertaking which belonged to the unsuccessful EuroLink consortium, brought an action for compensation in the High Court of Ireland, based on various alleged defects in the award procedure.

17. By judgment of 16 July 2004, (12) the High Court dismissed the action as out of time. Contrary to the view taken by SIAC, the High Court considered that SIAC must have known the grounds for its claim at the latest by 14 October 2003, when EuroLink was informed by the NRA of the identity of its preferred tenderer. In accordance with Order 84A(4) of the RSC, SIAC should have brought its action at the latest three months from that date.

18. SIAC thereupon complained to the Commission. In its complaint it alleged inter alia that it had not been informed at any time by the NRA of its award decision.

19. Following that complaint, the Commission first sent the Irish authorities an administrative letter on 15 November 2004, asking for further information on the facts. Ireland’s answer of 25 April 2005 was not capable of dispelling the Commission’s doubts. A letter of formal notice was thereupon sent by the Commission to Ireland on 10 April 2006, and a supplementary letter of formal notice on 15 December 2006, to which Ireland replied by letters of 30 May 2006 and 21 February 2007 respectively.

20. Since, however, Ireland’s explanations still failed to satisfy the Commission, it issued a reasoned opinion within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 226 EC on 1 February 2008, and required Ireland to take the necessary steps to comply with the reasoned opinion within two months. On 25 June 2008 Ireland replied to the reasoned opinion, stating inter alia that an amendment to the national laws, regulations and administrative provisions was being considered in the course of the transposition of Directive 2007/66. However, that answer too did not appear to the Commission to be adequate.

IV – Forms of order sought by the parties and procedure before the Court

21. By a pleading of 14 October 2008, received at the Court on 20 October 2008, the Commission brought the present action against Ireland under the second paragraph of Article 226 EC.

22. The Commission asks the Court to:

– declare that, by way of the rules on time-limits in the national legislation regulating the exercise of the right of tenderers to judicial review in public procurement procedures and by failing to notify the award decision to the complainant against that award decision, Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations, concerning the applicable time-limits, under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 as interpreted by the Court and, concerning the lack of notification, under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 as interpreted by the Court and Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37; and – order Ireland to pay the costs.

23. Ireland contends for its part that the Court should:

– dismiss the action; and

– order the Commission to pay the costs.

24. The Court received written submissions on the Commission's action, followed by oral argument, on 24 September 2009. (13)

V – Assessment

25. The Commission's action will be well founded if Ireland has failed to fulfil one of its obligations under the EC Treaty. Those obligations include, in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 249 EC and Article 10 EC, the duty to achieve the results aimed at by Community directives.

26. In the present case the Commission bases its action on two pleas. The first plea concerns an individual case: it relates to the alleged failure to inform the unsuccessful consortium of tenderers of the award decision for the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project. The second plea goes beyond that individual case: it denounces as contrary to Community law the provision of Irish law on the time-limits for seeking remedies, as laid down in Order 84A(4) of the RSC.

A – First plea: failure to notify the award decision

27. By its first plea, the Commission accuses Ireland of a failure to fulfil its obligations under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 and Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37, consisting in the fact that the NRA did not inform the unsuccessful tenderer, in accordance with those provisions, of its award decision concerning the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project.

28. Both the Commission and Ireland tacitly assume that the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project put out to tender by the NRA was a public works contract for the purposes of Directive 93/37.

29. The NRA as the contracting authority was therefore obliged under Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37 to inform tenderers or candidates promptly of its decision on the award of that contract.

30. The same obligation also arises under Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, because effective legal protection against award decisions can only be ensured if all candidates or tenderers are informed in good time and in detail of precisely those decisions. (14)

31. It is not disputed, however, that in the present case the NRA never formally informed EuroLink, the unsuccessful consortium of tenderers to which SIAC belonged, of its decision to award the road construction project in question to the competing consortium Celtic Roads Group.

32. Nor could the announcement of 9 February 2004 on the NRA's website and the notice of 3 April 2004 in the Official Journal of the European Union provide an adequate substitute. They merely informed the public of the final conclusion of the contract between the NRA and Celtic Roads Group. But in order to make effective legal protection possible for the unsuccessful candidates or tenderers, they should have been informed in good time before the contract was concluded – instead of being informed only after the creation of a fait accompli – about the NRA's award decision. (15)

33. The NRA thus failed to comply with its obligations to provide information under Article 8(2) of Directive 93/37 and Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 with respect to the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project.

34. Ireland objects that in the present case SIAC none the less suffered no injustice. In view of the circumstances of the particular case, at no time was there any uncertainty for SIAC as to the tenderer to which the NRA would award the contract. Ireland refers here to the NRA's letter of 14 October 2003, in which the EuroLink consortium was informed of the selection of Celtic Roads Group as the preferred tenderer. From that time at the latest, SIAC must in Ireland's view have been aware that – 'except in very exceptional circumstances' (16) – an award decision would be made in favour of Celtic Roads Group. On this point, Ireland expressly adopts the reasoning of the High Court of Ireland in the national review proceedings. (17)

35. This objection fails, however. In its letter of 14 October 2003 the NRA did not notify any final award decision; it even expressly informed EuroLink that its offer had not been rejected. The selection of a 'preferred tenderer' by NRA may already have been an important decision as to the direction to take, but it did not involve a definitive determination of a tenderer. The NRA expressly reserved the right to invite EuroLink to enter into discussions in the place of Celtic Roads Group at a later date if appropriate. EuroLink could therefore assume for the time being that it was not yet completely out of the running.

36. Apart from that, in an action under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, which is objective in nature, it is in any case irrelevant whether actual damage or other adverse effects have occurred as a result of the conduct of official bodies of a Member State. (18)

37. Ireland stresses, finally, that its national law is in harmony with the obligations under Community law to provide information; these are correctly transposed in Article 49(1) of the APAC Regulations. In those circumstances, an individual case in which no information was given on the award decision cannot be stigmatised as a breach of Community law.

38. This argument of Ireland is also unconvincing, however. First, it is by no means undisputed whether Article 49(1) of the APAC Regulations in fact correctly transposes the obligations under Community law to provide information; separate proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations are pending against Ireland on this point. (19) Second, it is settled case-law that, in an action for failure to fulfil obligations, not only can the compatibility of a Member State's laws, regulations and administrative provisions with Community law be examined, an infringement of Community law by the national bodies in a specific individual case can also be ascertained. (20)

39. Altogether, I therefore conclude that the Commission's first plea is well founded.

B – Second plea: rules on time-limits for legal remedies in Irish procedural law that are contrary to Community law

40. By its second plea, the Commission accuses Ireland of an infringement of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, consisting in the fact that Order 84A(4) of the RSC regulates the limitation period for applications in review procedures in a way which conflicts with the requirements of Community law.

41. Directive 89/665 makes no express provision on the time-limits that apply to review procedures under Article 1 of the directive. (21) However, the Court has consistently held that the Member States may in the exercise of their procedural autonomy introduce reasonable limitation periods for bringing proceedings, provided that they comply with the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. (22) Those two principles are also reflected in Article 1 of Directive 89/665, the principle of equivalence in Article 1(2) and the principle of effectiveness in Article 1(1). (23)

42. In the present case it is the principle of effectiveness that is the focus of interest. That Ireland can lay down limitation periods for applications for the review of decisions of contracting authorities is not in dispute. (24) The dispute between the parties concerns merely certain details of the national rules on limitation. The essential issue is whether those rules are sufficiently clear to make effective review within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 possible. The Commission denies this. It refers to lack of clarity in connection with determining the kinds of decisions against which challenges must be brought within the period laid down by Order 84A(4) of the RSC, and to lack of clarity as regards the duration of that period.

1. Determination of the kinds of decisions to which the limitation period applies (first part of the second plea)

43. By the first part of its second plea, the Commission complains that there is legal uncertainty as to the kind of procurement law decisions against which challenges must be brought within the period laid down by Order 84A(4) of the RSC. According to its wording, Order 84A(4) of the RSC applies only to the review of 'a decision to award or the award of a public contract'. In practice, however, according to the Commission, the scope of that provision is extended also to interim decisions, so that applications for their review can likewise be brought only within the period laid down by Order 84A(4) of the RSC.

44. The facts relied on by the Commission in this respect are not in dispute. Both the submissions of Ireland in the present proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations and the judgment of the High Court of Ireland on the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project (25) confirm that the period laid down in Order 84A(4) of the RSC is in practice applied by the competent Irish authorities not only to challenges to final decisions ('a decision to award or the award of a public contract') but also to challenges to interim decisions taken by contracting authorities. (26)

45. It is very much in dispute between the parties, however, whether Order 84A(4) of the RSC, as interpreted and applied by the national authorities, complies with the requirements of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665.

46. Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires that decisions of contracting authorities may be reviewed 'effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible' for breaches of procurement law.

47. To achieve that objective of the directive, the Member States must, in accordance with the third paragraph of Article 249 EC in conjunction with Article 10 EC, take all appropriate measures, both general and particular. According to settled case-law, they must establish a specific legal framework in the area in question. (27) They must make the situation in national law sufficiently precise, clear and transparent for individuals to be able to ascertain their rights and obligations. (28)

48. Moreover, the same follows from the principle of legal certainty, which is a general legal principle forming part of the Community legal order, and must be observed by the Member States when they exercise their powers within the scope of Community law. (29) According to settled case-law, one of the requirements of legal certainty is that rules of law must be clear, precise and predictable in their effects, especially where they may have negative consequences for individuals and undertakings. (30)

49. For a limitation rule such as that in Order 84A(4) of the RSC, the requirements of clarity, precision and predictability apply especially. An unclear limitation provision is liable to entail substantial negative consequences for individuals and undertakings. If a tenderer or candidate misses a deadline for bringing proceedings under Order 84A(4) of the RSC, he is barred from complaining of possible breaches of procurement law and loses the possibility of subjecting the award decision in question to a review. He is no longer entitled to go to court to obtain the public contract as such or at least compensation for the public contract he has lost. (31)

50. Yet the application of a limitation period must precisely not lead to the exercise of the right to review of award decisions being deprived of its practical effectiveness. (32)

51. Only if it is clear beyond doubt that even preparatory acts of contracting authorities or the interim decisions at issue in the present case start the limitation period under Order 84A(4) of the RSC running can tenderers and candidates take the necessary precautions to have possible breaches of procurement law reviewed effectively within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 and to avoid their challenges being statute-barred.

52. In this context, I regard it as incompatible with the requirements of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 for the scope of the limitation period under Order 84A(4) of the RSC to be extended in Ireland to the review of interim decisions, without that being clearly expressed in the wording of the provision. This is because the effects of the limitation rule, in particular the extent of its preclusive effect, cannot be predicted with sufficient certainty by tenderers and candidates in award procedures. The objective of effective review of decisions taken by contracting authorities, prescribed by Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, is thereby undermined.

– Ireland's objection that a time-limit for challenging interim decisions corresponds to the objectives of Directive 89/665, in particular the requirement to act rapidly

53. Ireland contends that under Directive 89/665 and the case-law on that directive all decisions taken by contracting authorities are open to challenge. The extension of the limitation rule in Order 84A(4) of the RSC to interim decisions is in harmony with the requirements of Community law. Moreover, Directive 89/665 is based on a requirement to act rapidly. Article 1(1) demands not only effective review but also review that is carried out as rapidly as possible of decisions of contracting authorities. The review of all decisions taken by contracting authorities must therefore be subject to the time-limit laid down by Order 84A(4) of the RSC. If it were permissible for unsuccessful tenderers to wait until the issue of the final award decision and make all their complaints then, there would be a risk of lengthy legal uncertainty and a considerable loss of time in connection with the award of public contracts. Furthermore, in Ireland's view, it would become impossible to remedy possible infringements of procurement law while an award procedure was still under way.

54. In this connection, it must be observed that Ireland is of course free to provide for limitation periods for procurement law review of preparatory acts and interim decisions of contracting authorities, for example the drawing-up of a shortlist or the choice of a preferred tenderer. As already mentioned, (33) the determination of appropriate limitation periods is compatible with Community law, provided that the principles of equivalence and effectiveness are observed in so doing. Such limitation periods – even comparatively short ones – may in particular be legitimate and appropriate if Community law lays down a requirement of rapid action in a certain field, by insisting – as in the case of procurement law – on action being taken 'as rapidly as possible' (34) (Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665). (35)

55. It is therefore entirely correct that, by extending the limitation rule in Order 84A(4) of the RSC to interim decisions, Ireland is pursuing a legitimate aim in harmony with the directive. (36) That aim must, however, be achieved in national law in conformity with the requirements of legal certainty. The limitation rule must be clearly and precisely worded and predictable in its effects. The existence of a national practice which serves the aims of a directive does not release the Member State from the obligation to create a legal situation that is sufficiently precise, clear and transparent for individuals to be able to ascertain their rights and obligations. (37)

56. In the present case, moreover, it should be borne in mind that Directive 89/665 imposes on the Member States not only the aim of rapid review but also the aim of effective review of award decisions (see Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665). A national practice which achieves only one of those aims at the expense of the other is not in harmony with the directive. The extension of the limitation period under Order 84A(4) of the RSC to interim decisions may indeed serve the aim of rapid review; without this also being made clear in the wording of Order 84A(4) of the RSC, however, the practice of the Irish authorities operates at the expense of legal certainty, and thus ultimately jeopardises the achievement of the aim of effective review. (38)

57. There is moreover no fundamental contradiction between the requirement of legal certainty and the requirement of rapid action in procurement law. (39) On the contrary, reviewing the decisions of contracting authorities as rapidly as possible helps to create legal certainty, provided that the applicable procedure, including limitation periods, is regulated in national law as clearly, precisely and predictably as possible.

58. Ireland's first objection must therefore be rejected.

– Ireland's objection that its national law is a common law system

59. Ireland further objects that its national law is a common law system. It says that in such a system not only statutory provisions but also decisions of the courts are determinative. Tenderers and candidates should obtain legal advice if necessary.

60. On this point, it must be observed that a directive leaves it to the national authorities to choose the form and methods for achieving the desired result (third paragraph of Article 249 EC). The transposition of a directive into national law therefore does not necessarily require the adoption of express and specific legal provisions, and a general legal context may also suffice in this respect. What matters, however, is that with such a method of proceeding the full application of the directive actually is ensured with sufficient clarity and precision. (40)

61. If the position in national law derives from the interplay of statutory provisions and 'judge-made' law, that must not take place at the expense of the clarity and precision of the provisions and rules concerned. That applies all the more where a directive is intended to confer rights on the individual (41) and an unclear or complex legal position with respect to limitation periods could lead to the loss of rights – in the present case the loss of the right to review of decisions taken by contracting authorities. Foreign tenderers and candidates in particular could be deterred from seeking public contracts in Ireland by a complex and non-transparent legal situation.

62. National courts are obliged to interpret and apply the provisions of national law consistently with directives. (42) Specifically with respect to procurement review procedures, they must interpret the national provisions laying down a limitation period, as far as is at all possible, in such a way as to ensure observance of the principle of effectiveness deriving from Directive 89/665. (43)

63. It is not compatible with those requirements for a national court to apply the limitation period laid down by law for the right to apply for review – in this case Order 84A(4) of the RSC – by going beyond its wording and applying it by analogy also to the review of decisions for which the legislature has not prescribed such a limitation period. The legal position is thereby made less transparent. The tenderers and candidates affected run the risk, in view of the preclusive effect of the limitation period, of losing their right to the review of certain decisions. The objective laid down in Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 of effective review of the decisions of contracting authorities is thereby undermined. (44)

64. In this context, Ireland's second objection must also be rejected.

– Interim conclusion

65. Altogether, therefore, I conclude that the first part of the Commission's second plea should be upheld.

2. Length of the limitation period (second part of the second plea)

66. By the second part of its second plea, the Commission objects to the phraseology of Order 84A(4) of the RSC, according to which applications for review must be made 'at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months'. It says that this provision leaves the tenderers and candidates in question uncertain as to the precise length of the limitation period, and makes it disproportionately difficult for them to bring an application for review. Moreover, according to the Commission, there is no indication of when an application within three months suffices and when the application must be brought earlier, before the expiry of three months.

67. It should be noted, first, that there need not necessarily be two independent limitation periods if a provision combines an indication of time expressed in days, weeks, months or years with the words 'at the earliest opportunity' or a similar expression. Many provisions use such additions simply in order to emphasise the need for rapidity and to remind applicants of their responsibility, in their own interests, for taking the necessary steps as early as possible, in order best to protect their interests.

68. In the latter sense, for example, the Court itself formerly used the words 'as soon as possible' in relation to possible applications by the parties for an extension of speaking time at the hearing. (45) Members of the temporary staff of the Community who become unemployed must comply with certain formalities 'as soon as possible and no later than [within certain defined time-limits]'. (46) Similar wording may also be found where the intention is to state that public authorities handling certain applications or procedures are subject to a duty to act expeditiously. (47) In procurement law too, the concept of a 'duty of diligence, which falls to be categorised more as an obligation as to means than an obligation as to results' is not unknown. (48)

69. In relation to the limitation rule in Order 84A(4) of the RSC at issue in this case, however, it cannot be presumed with certainty that the words 'at the earliest opportunity' are merely intended to express the principle of acting expeditiously. Rather, according to Ireland's submissions in the procedure before the Court, it cannot be ruled out that the expression 'at the earliest opportunity' in Order 84A(4) of the RSC has a wider meaning, and is to be understood as an independent limitation period which may make applications for review inadmissible even before the expiry of the three-month period which exists ‘in any event’.

70. It is true that Ireland appears to assume that an application for review will normally be in time if it is made ‘in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the application first arose’. At the same time, however, Ireland emphasises, referring to a judgment of its Supreme Court, (49) that the ‘primary obligation’ (50) of an applicant in the context of Order 84A(4) of the RSC is to bring his action ‘at the earliest opportunity’. In certain circumstances this could lead to an application for review being dismissed as out of time even if it was made within the three-month period. (51) It is thus at least not excluded that the words ‘at the earliest opportunity’ in Order 84A(4) of the RSC are understood by the Irish courts as an independent limitation period. (52)

71. If it is the case that the expression ‘at the earliest opportunity’ in Order 84A(4) of the RSC really gives the Irish courts power, at their discretion, to dismiss applications for review as inadmissible even before expiry of the three-month period, then it does not satisfy the requirements of Community law. A limitation period whose duration is at the discretion of the competent court is not predictable in its effects. The tenderers and candidates concerned are uncertain as to how much time they have to prepare their applications for review properly, and they are scarcely able to estimate the prospects of success of such applications. The objective imposed by Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 of effective review of decisions taken by the contracting authorities is thereby missed. (53)

72. Since it cannot be ruled out that the words ‘at the earliest opportunity’ in Order 84A(4) of the RSC are understood by the national courts as an independent limitation period, that provision is furthermore not sufficiently clear to ensure that it is applied in a manner consistent with Community law. (54) For this reason too, Order 84A(4) of the RSC is not an adequate transposition of Directive 89/665.

– Ireland’s objection that the national courts could if necessary extend the limitation period at their discretion

73. Ireland contends that Order 84A(4) of the RSC gives the national courts a discretion to extend the period for bringing applications for review; as an example, Ireland cites a judgment of the High Court of Ireland of 2006. (55)

74. Such a possibility of extending time may indeed make it easier for the courts to do justice in the individual case. It is not capable, however, of curing the shortcomings described above of Order 84A(4) of the RSC with respect to the requirements of clarity, precision and predictability of the limitation rule. For the tenderers and candidates concerned, it is not predictable in advance, even taking into account this possibility of extending time, how much time they will have to prepare an application for review properly or whether such a remedy has a prospect of success. On the contrary, a limitation rule which is already unclear in any case is thereby endowed with a further element of uncertainty.

75. Article 1(1) in conjunction with Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665 gives any person who has or had an interest in obtaining a particular public contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement an individual right to review of the decisions of the contracting authority. (56) As I also explain in Case C-406/08 Uniplex (UK), the effective assertion of such a claim cannot be made to depend on the absolute discretion of a national body, not even the discretion of an independent court. (57)

76. Ireland’s first objection must therefore be rejected.

– Ireland’s objection that no action has yet been dismissed as out of time on the ground of non-compliance with the ‘at the earliest opportunity’ rule

77. Ireland additionally argues that no Irish court has yet dismissed an application for review as out of time because it was brought within three months but not ‘at the earliest opportunity’.

78. This second objection also fails. To prove that a directive has not been adequately or properly transposed, it is not necessary to establish the actual effects of the national transposition measures.

Whether the transposition is inadequate or defective appears rather from the wording of the relevant legislation itself. (58) An action seeking a declaration of a failure to fulfil obligations is objective in nature, and can be brought even before any actual damage has been incurred or other harmful effects produced. (59)

– Ireland's objection that the national legal position is about to be altered

79. Finally, Ireland defended itself in the pre-litigation procedure with the argument that national law would in any case be amended in connection with the transposition of Directive 2007/66, which would make it possible to clarify Order 84A(4) of the RSC.

80. On this point, it suffices to point out that, according to settled case-law, the question whether there is a failure to fulfil obligations must be determined by reference to the situation obtaining in the relevant Member State at the end of the period laid down by the reasoned opinion; subsequent changes cannot be taken into account by the Court. (60) Still less can amendments to national law be taken into account if they are still in the planning or drafting stage.

– Interim conclusion

81. Altogether, I conclude that the second part of the second plea is also well founded, and that the Commission's action must therefore succeed in its entirety.

VI – Costs

82. In accordance with Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party must be ordered to pay the costs, if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has made such an application and Ireland has been unsuccessful, Ireland must be ordered to pay the costs.

VII – Conclusion

83. On the above basis, I propose that the Court should:

(1) declare that Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations under the EC Treaty, in that

(a) the Irish National Roads Authority did not inform the unsuccessful tenderer of its award decision concerning the Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project, contrary to the requirements of Article 8(2) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts and Article 1(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, and

(b) it is not sufficiently clear from Order 84A(4) of the Rules of the Superior Courts, contrary to the requirements of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665/EEC, how long the limitation period is for an application for review of an award decision, and which decisions of the contracting authority are affected by that period;

(2) order Ireland to pay the costs of the proceedings.

31 – The Dundalk Western Bypass motorway construction project, which gave rise to the present proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations, is a clear example of the preclusionary effect of Order 84A(4) of the RSC: in Ireland's view, SIAC should already have challenged the NRA's interim decision on the selection of the preferred tenderer within the period laid down by Order 84A(4) of the RSC and already put forward its complaints as to the choice of the Celtic Roads Group consortium at that stage. When it made its subsequent challenge to the final decision, SIAC, as the judgment of the High Court of Ireland in SIAC v NRA, cited in footnote 12, found, was already out of time with its application.

51 – Quoting an obiter dictum from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ireland in Dekra Éireann Teoranta, cited in footnote 49, Ireland states that 'in certain circumstances a court could refuse an application under Order 84A, rule 4, brought within three months where the prejudice to the public or a party could be such that the application should be refused'.

52 – In this connection, the observations of Denham J in Dekra Éireann Teoranta, cited in footnote 49, are particularly illuminating. Denham J states to begin with, on the essentially identical limitation provision in Order 84(21)(1) of the RSC: 'Whilst there is a discretion in the court to extend this time, there is also a discretion to refuse the application even within the months specified in the Rules of the Superior Courts'

([2003] 2 IR 270, at 285). Denham J then addresses the question of the interpretation of the limitation provision in Order 84A(4) of the RSC, at issue in the present case, and interprets it as follows: '… in all the circumstances of a case a court may determine in its discretion that the prejudice to the public or a party could be such that … the application should be refused. Since urgency and rapidity is an underpinning policy of applications regarding public contracts, the test requires that such applications be made rapidly and an applicant must explain reasonably any delay' ([2003] 2 IR 270, at 286).

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Second Chamber)

23 December 2009 (*)

(Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations – Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC – Public supply and public works contracts – Review procedure against a contract award decision – Guarantee of effective review – Minimum period to be ensured between notification to the unsuccessful tenderers of the decision to award a contract and the signature of the contract concerned)

In Case C-455/08,

ACTION under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, brought on 17 October 2008,

European Commission, represented by G. Zavvos and M. Konstantinidis, acting as Agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg, applicant,

v

Ireland, represented by D. O'Hagan, acting as Agent,

defendant,

THE COURT (Second Chamber), composed of J.N. Cunha Rodrigues (Rapporteur), President of the Chamber, P. Lindh, A. Rosas, U. Lõhmus and A. Ó Caoimh, Judges, Advocate General: P. Mengozzi,

Registrar: R. Grass,

having regard to the written procedure,

having decided, after hearing the Advocate General, to proceed to judgment without an Opinion,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By its application, the European Commission sought a declaration from the Court that, by adopting Article 49 of Statutory Instrument No 329 of 2006 ('S.I. No 329 of 2006') and Article 51 of Statutory Instrument No 50 of 2007 ('S.I. No 50 of 2007'), Ireland established the rules governing the notification of contracting authorities' and entities' award decisions and their reasoning to tenderers in such a way that by the time tenderers are fully informed of the reasons for the rejection of their offer, the standstill period for the conclusion of the contract has already expired, and that, by so doing, Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33), as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1), and Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Council Directive 92/13/EEC of 25 February 1992 coordinating the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of Community rules on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (OJ 1992 L 76, p. 14), as interpreted by the Court in its judgment in Case C-81/98 Alcatel Austria and Others [1999] ECR I-7671 and its judgment of 24 June 2004 in Case C-212/02 Commission v Austria.

Legal context

2 Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 provides:

‘The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC and 92/50/EEC … , decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles, and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or nation[al] rules implementing that law.’

3 Article 2(1) of Directive 89/665 provides:

‘The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.’

4 Article 1(1) of Directive 92/13 provides:

‘The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that decisions taken by contracting entities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(8), on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field [of] procurement or national rules implementing that law as regards:

(a) contract award procedures falling within the scope of Council Directive 90/531/EEC; and

(b) compliance with Article 3(2)(a) of that Directive in the case of the contracting entities to which that provision applies.’

5 Article 2(1) of that directive provides:

‘The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers:

either

(a) to take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedure, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further injury to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting entity; and

(b) to set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the notice of contract, the periodic indicative notice, the notice on the existence of a system of qualification, the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure in question;

(c) to take, at the earliest opportunity, if possible by way of interlocutory procedures and if necessary by a final procedure on the substance, measures other than those provided for in points (a) and (b) with the aim of correcting any identified infringement and preventing injury to the interests concerned; in particular, making an order for the payment of a particular sum, in cases where the infringement has not been corrected or prevented.

Member States may take this choice either for all contracting entities or for categories of entities defined on the basis of objective criteria, in any event preserving the effectiveness of the measures laid down in order to prevent injury being caused to the interests concerned;

(d) and, in both the above cases, to award damages to persons injured by the infringement.

Where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision has been taken unlawfully, Member States may, where their system of internal law so requires and provides bodies having the necessary powers for that purpose, provide that the contested decision must first be set aside or declared illegal.'

6 The above provisions of Directives 89/665 and 92/13 were amended by Directive 2007/66/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 December 2007 amending Council Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC with regard to improving the effectiveness of review procedures concerning the award of public contracts (OJ 2007 L 335, p. 31), which entered into force on 9 January 2008 and the time-limit for the transposition of which expired on 20 December 2009.

S.I. No 329 of 2006

7 Article 49 of S.I. No 329 of 2006, which, Ireland submits, transposes into Irish law Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114), states:

'(1) As soon as practicable after reaching a decision about entering into a public contract or framework agreement or admission to a dynamic purchasing system, a contracting authority shall inform candidates and tenderers of the decision by the most rapid means of communication possible (such as by electronic mail or by telefax). If the authority notifies its decision by electronic mail or telefax, it shall confirm the decision in writing if a candidate or tenderer so requests.

(3) As soon as possible, and in any event no later than 15 days after the date on which a contracting authority receives a request to do so, the authority shall inform:

(a) a candidate whose application is rejected of the reasons for the rejection, or

(b) a tenderer whose tender is rejected of the reasons for the rejection (including, in a case referred to in Regulation 23(9) or (10), the reasons for the authority's decision of non-equivalence or that the works, supplies or service do not meet the authority's performance or functional requirements), or

(c) a tenderer that has made an admissible tender of the characteristics and relative advantages of the tender selected as well as the name of the successful tenderer or the parties to the framework

(5) A contracting authority shall not enter into a public contract with a successful tenderer unless at least 14 days have elapsed since the date on which tenderers were informed of the contract award decision in accordance with paragraph (1).'

S.I. No 50 of 2007

8 Article 51 of S.I. No 50 of 2007, the purpose of which, Ireland submits, is to transpose into Irish law Directive 2004/17/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and postal services sectors (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 1), provides:

'(1) As soon as possible after reaching a decision about

(a) entering into a framework agreement or awarding a regulated contract, or

(b) admission to a dynamic purchase system, a contracting entity shall notify candidates and tenderers of the decision by the most rapid available means of communication, such as electronic mail or fax.

(4) A contracting entity that has rejected a candidate's application shall, as soon as practicable and in any case within 15 days after receiving a request to do so, inform the candidate of the reasons for the rejection.

(5) A contracting entity that has rejected a tenderer's tender shall

(a) when notifying the tenderer in accordance with paragraph (1), indicate the principal reason, or reasons, why the tender is not the selected tender;

(b) as soon as practicable, and in any case within 15 days after receiving a request from a tenderer that has made an admissible tender, inform that tenderer of

(i) the characteristics and relative advantages of the selected tender, and

(ii) the name of the successful tenderer or parties to the framework agreement.

(8) A contracting entity may not enter into a regulated contract with a successful tenderer unless at least 14 days have elapsed since the date on which tenderers were informed, in accordance with paragraph (1), of the decision to award the contract to that tenderer.'

Pre-litigation procedure

9 It is clear from the contents of the file submitted to the Court that Directives 89/665 and 92/13 were transposed into Irish law by Statutory Instrument No 309 of 1994 ('S.I. No 309 of 1994') and by Statutory Instrument No 104 of 1993, respectively.

10 By letter of 17 May 2001, the Commission asked the Irish authorities for information relating to the implementation of Directive 89/665 which, according to the judgment in Alcatel Austria and Others, requires the Member States to establish effective review procedures that are as rapid as possible to ensure the setting aside of any decision taken unlawfully by a contracting authority at the stage where infringements can still be rectified.

11 The Irish authorities replied, by letter of 27 July 2001, that the body designated to review appeals against contracting authorities' unlawful decisions was the High Court, which had the power, among others, to declare the disputed contract void. According to those authorities, although S.I. No 309 of 1994 lacks a specific provision concerning the notification of the contract award decision, there is a 'general policy' to notify the unsuccessful tenderers of that decision at the same time as the successful tenderer is notified of it. Despite the voluntary nature of that notification and the lack of a standstill period between that notification and the conclusion of the contract, unsuccessful tenderers have ample time to initiate appropriate review procedures.

12 By letter of 18 October 2002, the Commission gave Ireland formal notice to submit, within two months, its observations with regard to the three specific obligations arising from the judgment in Alcatel Austria and Others, that, first, the contract award decision must be distinct from the conclusion of the contract and amenable to review by a court, second, that decision must be notified to all the participants in the procedure and, third, a reasonable period must be prescribed between that decision and the conclusion of the contract so as to allow tenderers to commence proceedings concerning the decision.

13 Since the Commission considered the Irish authorities' reply of 7 January 2004 to be unsatisfactory, it issued, by letter of 1 April 2004, a reasoned opinion in which it invited Ireland to take the measures necessary to comply with the opinion within two months from its notification.

14 In its reply of 6 August 2004, Ireland stated that it envisaged amending its law in accordance with the arguments set out in the reasoned opinion and, at a meeting held on 5 November 2004, specified that it would do so as part of the transposition of Directives 2004/17 and 2004/18.

15 The final draft of the legislation envisaged, in so far as it concerned the transposition of Directive 2004/18, was communicated to the Commission on 22 September 2005. On 17 July 2006, Ireland notified the Commission of S.I. No 329 of 2006 as legislation transposing Directive 2004/18.

16 Since it considered that those measures did not comply with the requirements of the judgment in Alcatel Austria and Others, and that no measures had been adopted to give effect to the same requirements arising from Commission v Austria regarding the special sectors covered by Directive 2004/17, the Commission sent Ireland an additional letter of formal notice on 15 December 2006.

17 Ireland replied to the additional letter of formal notice on 13 March 2007. That reply was considered unsatisfactory by the Commission, inasmuch as the Irish authorities acknowledged the need to amend their legislation but referred to no concrete measures which they intended to take or any timetable for adopting such measures.

18 By letter of 1 February 2008, the Commission served Ireland with an additional reasoned opinion, in which it concluded that Ireland had failed to fulfil its obligations in the terms of the action, as set out in paragraph 1 of the present judgment.

19 Ireland replied to the additional reasoned opinion by a letter of 17 March 2008, in which it stated that, as the matters at issue were thenceforth dealt with in Directive 2007/66, it would comply with the reasoned opinion by making the necessary revisions to its legislation prior to the time-limit for transposing that directive, namely 20 December 2009.

20 Since it was not satisfied with that response, the Commission decided to bring the present action.

Arguments of the parties

21 The Commission submits that it follows from paragraphs 34 and 43 of the judgment in Alcatel Austria and Others that Articles 1(1) and 2(1)(a) and (b) of Directive 89/665 require the Member States to establish effective review procedures that are as rapid as possible to enable unsuccessful tenderers to have any decision taken unlawfully by the contracting authority set aside at the stage where infringements can still be rectified. Similar obligations arise from the corresponding articles of Directive 92/13 (see Commission v Austria, paragraph 23). It follows that a reasonable period must elapse between the time when the contract award decision is communicated to unsuccessful tenderers and the conclusion of the contract with the successful tenderer, in order, in particular, to allow an application to be made for interim measures prior to such conclusion.

22 However, neither Article 49 of S.I. No 329 of 2006 nor Article 51 of S.I. No 50 of 2007 satisfies those requirements. Those provisions do not ensure that tenderers are fully informed of the reasons for the refusal of their tender so as to put them in a position, in sufficient time before the expiry of the standstill period for the conclusion of the contract with the successful tenderer, to consider whether the decision awarding the contract is valid.

23 Whilst it is true that Directive 2007/66 deals with those questions by codifying and detailing the requirements in the field, that is irrelevant because the Irish legislation covered by the present action does not comply with Directives 89/665 and 92/13. Those directives must be implemented with unquestionable binding force, and the specificity, precision and clarity necessary to satisfy the requirements of legal certainty, which demand that where a directive is intended to create rights for individuals, the beneficiaries of those rights can ascertain their full extent.

24 Ireland admits that the requirements arising from Directives 89/665 and 92/13, as interpreted by the Court in Alcatel Austria and Others and Commission v Austria, have not been incorporated into its national law. It submits, however, that it would not be appropriate to declare that it has failed to fulfil its obligations in the manner alleged, since the precise extent of those obligations had not been clearly defined at the time when it adopted the measures necessary for the transposition of Directives 2004/17 and 2004/18 into Irish law. In addition, Ireland submits that Directive 2007/66 deals directly with the questions raised in the present action, and it proposed to adopt the measures necessary to transpose the latter directive into Irish law prior to 20 December 2009.

25 Ireland adds that it has taken steps to ensure that the measures required by the Commission are henceforth carried out in practice. It observes that it informed the Commission that all public purchasers are registered on the national public procurement website. All those purchasers, as well as members of a wide network of public procurement managers and other procurement officials have been reminded of the need to have award decisions reasoned with sufficient information to enable a tenderer to decide within the standstill period preceding the conclusion of the contract whether an award appears valid or there are justifiable grounds for seeking a review. That information was notified to the Commission by letter of 14 March 2008.

26 As is clear from the Court's case-law, the provisions of Directives 89/665 and 92/13, which are intended to protect tenderers against arbitrary decisions by the contracting authority, seek to reinforce existing arrangements for ensuring effective application of the Community rules on the award of public contracts, in particular where infringements can still be rectified (see, particularly, Commission v Austria, paragraph 20). The objective of those directives is to ensure that unlawful decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and as rapidly as possible (see, particularly, Case C-444/06 Commission v Spain [2008] ECR I-2045, paragraph 44).

27 The Court has held, in particular, that the Member States are required to ensure that the contracting authority's decision, prior to the conclusion of the contract in a tender procedure, as to the bidder with which it will conclude the contract is in all cases open to review in a procedure whereby an applicant may have that decision set aside if the relevant conditions are met, notwithstanding the possibility, once the contract has been concluded, of obtaining an award of damages (see, particularly, Alcatel Austria and Others, paragraph 43).

28 The complete legal protection which must be ensured before the conclusion of the contract presupposes, in particular, the duty to inform the tenderers of the award decision before such conclusion so that they may have a real possibility of initiating review proceedings. That same protection requires provision to be made for the unsuccessful tenderer to examine in sufficient time the question of whether the award decision is valid, which means that a reasonable period must pass between the moment when the contract award decision is notified to the unsuccessful tenderers and the conclusion of the contract, in order to allow them, in particular, to bring an application for interim measures until the conclusion of the contract (see to that effect, particularly, Commission v Austria, paragraphs 21 and 23; Commission v Spain, paragraphs 38 and 39; and the judgment of 11 June 2009 in Case C-327/08 Commission v France, paragraphs 41 and 56). Therefore, the fact that there is the option of bringing proceedings for the annulment of the contract itself is not such as to compensate for the impossibility of challenging the mere act of awarding the contract concerned, before the contract is concluded (Commission v Spain, paragraph 45).

29 However, as Ireland admits, S.I. No 329 of 2006 and S.I. No 50 of 2007 do not meet those requirements.

30 First, Article 49 of S.I. No 329 of 2006 provides that tenderers must be informed of the decision to award a public contract by the most rapid means of communication possible, as soon as practicable after the contracting authority has made its decision. From the date of such information, the standstill period which must elapse before the conclusion of the contract must be at least 14 days. However, under the terms of the same provision, the contracting authority is required to state the reasons for the rejection of a tender only if it receives an express request to do so, and then only 'as soon as possible, and in any event no later than 15 days' after its receipt of the request.

31 As Ireland accepts, it follows that the standstill period may already have expired when an unsuccessful tenderer is fully informed of the reasons for the rejection of its tender. Yet, as the Commission maintains, the reasons for the decision to reject the tender must be communicated at the time of the notification of that decision to the tenderers concerned and, in all cases, in sufficient time before the conclusion of the contract, in order to allow the unsuccessful tenderers to bring, in particular, an application for interim measures until such conclusion.

32 Secondly, Article 51 of S.I. No 50 of 2007 provides that the unsuccessful tenderers are to be informed, at the time when the award decision is notified, of 'the principal reason, or reasons, why [their] tender is not the selected tender'. However, as the Commission maintains, the discretion which that provision allows the contracting authority is such that unsuccessful tenderers are at risk of receiving incomplete information and very generally formulated explanations concerning the rejection of their tender, so that they are prevented from examining the validity of the award decision in sufficient time.

33 Indeed, since the standstill period preceding the conclusion of the contract with the successful tenderer is 14 days, whereas the period allowed the contracting authority to inform the unsuccessful tenderers of the 'characteristics and relative advantages of the selected tender' is 15 days after receiving a request to do so, by the time that tenderers are fully informed of the reasons for the rejection of their tender, the standstill period preceding the conclusion of the contract may already have expired.

34 As is clear from paragraph 31 of the present judgment, the reasons for the decision to reject their tender must be communicated to the tenderers concerned in sufficient time before the conclusion of the contract, in order to allow the unsuccessful tenderers to bring, in particular, an application for interim measures until such conclusion.

35 Ireland observes that it will comply with the requirements arising from Articles 1 and 2 of Directives 89/665 and 92/13 as part of the implementation of Directive 2007/66, which must be effected by 20 December 2009 at the latest, that meanwhile it has taken steps to ensure that those requirements are carried out in practice and that it would be inappropriate for the Court to uphold the present action, since the precise extent of the requirements in question was not clearly defined before delivery of the judgment in Alcatel Austria and Others.

36 However, none of those arguments can lead to the dismissal of the present action.

37 In response to the argument based on the transposition of Directive 2007/66 into Irish law, it is sufficient to point out that the question whether a Member State has failed to fulfil its obligations must be determined by reference to the situation in the Member State at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. The Court cannot take account of any subsequent changes (see, particularly, Commission v Austria, paragraph 28).

38 As regards the argument based on the steps undertaken by Ireland so that the requirements under Directives 89/665 and 92/13 are carried out in practice, it need merely be recalled that, according to established case-law, the provisions of directives must be implemented with unquestionable binding force, and the specificity, precision and clarity necessary to satisfy the requirements of legal certainty (see, particularly, Case C-225/97 Commission v France [1999] ECR I-3011, paragraph 37), that the incompatibility of national legislation with Community provisions can be remedied for good only by means of binding national provisions having the same legal force as those which must be amended (see, particularly, Case C-160/99 Commission v France [2000] ECR I-6137, paragraph 23), and that mere administrative practices, which by their nature are alterable at will by the authorities and are not given the appropriate publicity, cannot be regarded as constituting fulfilment of the obligations owed by the Member States in the context of transposition of a directive (see, particularly, Case C-508/04 Commission v Austria [2007] ECR I-3787, paragraph 80).

39 As for the argument that the relevant Community legislation lacked clarity before delivery of the judgment in Alcatel Austria and Others, it is appropriate to point out that, according to settled case-law, the interpretation which the Court gives to a rule of Community law clarifies and defines, where necessary, the meaning and scope of that rule as it must be or ought to have been understood and applied from the time of its coming into force (see, particularly, Case C-453/00 Kühne & Heitz [2004] ECR I-837, paragraph 21). In other words, a preliminary ruling does not create or alter the law, but is purely declaratory, with the consequence that in principle it takes effect from the date on which the rule interpreted entered into force (see, particularly, Case C-2/06 Kempter [2008] ECR I-411, paragraph 35).

40 Furthermore, the objective of the pre-litigation procedure provided for in Article 226 EC is precisely to give the Member State concerned an opportunity to comply, as appropriate, with its obligations under Community law (see, particularly, Case C-490/04 Commission v Germany [2007] ECR I-6095, paragraph 25).

41 As Ireland admits, when the period laid down in the reasoned opinion expired, Irish law still did not satisfy the requirements arising from Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Directives 89/665 and 92/13, as interpreted by the Court in its judgments in Alcatel Austria and Others and in Case C-212/02 Commission v Austria.

42 Having regard to the foregoing considerations, it must be held that, by adopting Article 49 of S.I. No 329 of 2006 and Article 51 of S.I. No 50 of 2007, Ireland established the rules governing the notification of contracting authorities' and entities' award decisions and their reasoning to tenderers in such a way that by the time that tenderers are fully informed of the reasons for the rejection of their offer, the standstill period preceding the conclusion of the contract may already have expired, and that, by so doing, Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Directives 89/665 and 92/13.

Costs

43 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has applied for costs and Ireland has been unsuccessful, Ireland must be ordered to pay the costs.

On those grounds, the Court (Second Chamber) hereby:

1. Declares that, by adopting Article 49 of Statutory Instrument No 329 of 2006 and Article 51 of Statutory Instrument No 50 of 2007, Ireland established the rules governing the notification of contracting authorities' and entities' award decisions and their reasoning to tenderers in such a way that by the time that tenderers are fully informed of the reasons for the rejection of their offer, the standstill period preceding the conclusion of the contract may already have expired, and that, by so doing, Ireland has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992, and Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of Council Directive 92/13/EEC of 25 February 1992 coordinating the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of Community rules on the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors;

2. Orders Ireland to pay the costs.

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 17 November 2009,

gives the following

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of the concept of ‘public works contracts’ within the meaning of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114).

2 The reference has been made in the context of proceedings between Helmut Müller GmbH (‘Helmut Müller’) and the Bundesanstalt für Immobilienaufgaben (the federal agency responsible for managing public property; ‘the Bundesanstalt’) concerning the sale by the latter of land on which the purchaser was subsequently to carry out works corresponding to the urban-planning objectives of a local authority, in the present case the municipality of Wildeshausen.

Legal framework

3 Under recital 2 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18:

‘The award of contracts concluded in the Member States on behalf of the State, regional or local authorities and other bodies governed by public law entities, is subject to the respect of the principles of the [EC] Treaty and in particular to the principle of freedom of movement of goods, the principle of freedom of establishment and the principle of freedom to provide services and to the principles deriving therefrom, such as the principle of equal treatment, the principle of non-discrimination, the principle of mutual recognition, the principle of proportionality and the principle of transparency. However, for public contracts above a certain value, it is advisable to draw up provisions of Community coordination of national procedures for the award of such contracts which are based on these principles so as to ensure the effects of them and to guarantee the opening-up of public procurement to competition. These coordinating provisions should therefore be interpreted in accordance with both the aforementioned rules and principles and other rules of the Treaty.’

4 Article 1(2) and (3) of the directive provides as follows:

‘2. (a) “Public contracts” are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive.

(b) “Public works contracts” are public contracts having as their object either the execution, or both the design and execution, of works related to one of the activities within the meaning of Annex I or a work, or the realisation, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority. A “work” means the outcome of building or civil engineering works taken as a whole which is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic or technical function.

3. “Public works concession” is a contract of the same type as a public works contract except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment.’

5 Article 16(a) of Directive 2004/18 states:

‘This Directive shall not apply to public service contracts for:

(a) the acquisition or rental, by whatever financial means, of land, existing buildings or other immovable property or concerning rights thereon; …’

National legislation

6 Paragraph 10(1) of the Building Code (Baugesetzbuch) of 23 September 2004 (BGBl. 2004 I, p. 2414; ‘the BauGB’) provides:

‘The municipality shall adopt the development plan by means of a by-law.’

7 Paragraph 12 of the BauGB provides as follows:

‘1. The municipality may decide, by means of a building plan for the works, on the admissibility of a project where, on the basis of a plan drawn up in agreement with the municipality for the execution of the works and for the supply of utilities (works and utilities plan), the contractor is ready and able to execute the works and, before the decision under Paragraph 10(1), undertakes to execute them within a prescribed period and to bear the planning costs and the costs relating to the supply of utilities in full or in part (contract to execute works) …

3. (a) Where, by determining a zone for construction of the works or by other means, a building plan for the works lays down … a building use … , it must … be provided, with regard to the specified uses, that the only projects which are authorised are those which the contractor undertook to execute in the contract for execution of the works …

…’

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

8 The Bundesanstalt was owner of a property known as the ‘Wittekind barracks’, occupying an area of just under 24 hectares in Wildeshausen, Germany.

9 In October 2005, Wildeshausen town council decided, with a view to returning the land concerned – which covers approximately 3% of developed and non-developed areas of the town – to civilian use, to undertake feasibility studies for an urban planning project.

10 In October 2006, the Bundesanstalt indicated in statements made on the internet and in the press that it intended to sell Wittekind barracks.

11 On 2 November 2006, Helmut Müller, a property development company, offered to buy the land for EUR 4 million, subject, however, to the condition that an urban development plan be drawn up on the basis of its project for use of the land.

12 Wittekind barracks were closed at the beginning of 2007.

13 In January 2007 the Bundesanstalt launched a call for tenders with a view to selling the property, in its condition at the time, as quickly as possible.

14 On 9 January 2007, Helmut Müller submitted a tender offer of EUR 400 000, which it increased to EUR 1 million on 15 January 2007.

15 Another property development company, Gut Spascher Sand Immobilien GmbH (‘GSSI’), which was at that time in the process of being set up, submitted a tender offer of EUR 2.5 million.

16 Two other tender offers were submitted.

17 According to an experts’ report produced by the Bundesanstalt before the national court, the value of the land concerned, on 1 May 2007, was EUR 2.33 million.

18 The order for reference indicates that the tenderers' plans were submitted to and discussed with the Wildeshausen municipal authorities, in the presence of the Bundesanstalt.

19 In the meantime, the Bundesanstalt had assessed the plans submitted by Helmut Müller and GSSI and expressed a preference for GSSI's project on urban-development grounds, taking the view that it would make Wildeshausen more attractive as a town. It informed the municipal authorities accordingly.

20 It was then agreed that the property should not be sold until after Wildeshausen town council had approved the project. The Bundesanstalt confirmed that it would respect the town council's decision.

21 As is further apparent from the order for reference, Wildeshausen town council decided in favour of GSSI's project and, on 24 May 2007, decided inter alia as follows:

'Wildeshausen town council is prepared to examine the project submitted by Mr R. [GSSI's managing director] and to embark on the procedure of drawing up a corresponding building plan for the area ...

There is no statutory right to obtain a (possibly project-related) building plan.

It is unlawful [for the municipality of Wildeshausen] to give binding undertakings on building use or to restrict its discretion (which is, furthermore, subject to legal constraints) before appropriate urban planning procedures have been concluded.

The abovementioned decisions are therefore in no way binding with respect to any land-use plan of [the municipality of Wildeshausen].

The contractor and the other persons involved in the project are liable in respect of the risks associated with planning and other costs.'

22 Immediately after that decision of 24 May 2007, Wildeshausen town council revoked its decision of October 2005 to undertake preliminary urban planning studies.

23 By notarial deed of 6 June 2007, the Bundesanstalt, with the concurrence of the municipality of Wildeshausen, sold Wittekind barracks to GSSI. It informed Helmut Müller of that sale on 7 June 2007. In January 2008, GSSI was entered in the land register as owner of the property. By notarial deed of 15 May 2008, the Bundesanstalt and GSSI confirmed the sales contract of 6 June 2007.

24 Helmut Müller brought an action before the Vergabekammer (body with jurisdiction at first instance in public procurement cases), arguing that public procurement rules had not been followed even though the sale of the barracks was subject to public procurement law. Helmut Müller claimed that the sales contract was void because it, Helmut Müller, had not been kept properly informed in its capacity as potential purchaser of the land.

25 The Vergabekammer dismissed the action as inadmissible on the ground, essentially, that GSSI had not been awarded a works contract.

26 Helmut Müller appealed against that decision to the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf (Higher Regional Court, Düsseldorf), claiming that, in the light of the circumstances, GSSI was to be regarded as being about to obtain a works contract in the form of a works concession. According to Helmut Müller, the relevant decisions had been taken jointly by the Bundesanstalt and the municipality of Wildeshausen.

27 The Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf is inclined to agree with that argument. It takes the view that, at some point in the relatively near future – which cannot yet be determined with precision – the municipality of Wildeshausen will exercise its discretion and draw up a building plan for the works in accordance with Paragraph 12 of the BauGB and award GSSI a contract for execution of works within the meaning of that paragraph, and thus a public works contract.

28 Since the municipality of Wildeshausen is not permitted to pay any remuneration, the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf is of the opinion that that public works contract ought to be awarded in the legal form of a public works concession, and that GSSI should bear the economic risk inherent in that transaction. The Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf also regards the transfer of ownership of the land and the award of a public works contract as forming a whole from the point of view of public procurement law. The steps taken by the Bundesanstalt and by the municipality of Wildeshausen merely occurred at different times.

29 The Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf adds that it has adopted the same point of view in other cases before it, in particular in its judgment of 13 June 2007 concerning the airport in Ahlhorn (Germany). Its analysis has not, however, met with unanimous approval; German case-law is predominantly at odds with its interpretation. In addition, according to the order for reference, the German Federal Government was about to amend German public-procurement legislation in a manner which runs counter to the position advocated by the Oberlandesgericht.

30 The draft legislation mentioned by the Oberlandesgericht sought to clarify the definition of the concept of 'public works contracts' in Paragraph 99(3) of the Law against restraints on competition (Gesetz gegen Wettbewerbsbeschränkungen) of 15 July 2005 (BGBl. 2005 I, p. 2114) as follows (the proposed amendments being shown in italics):

'Works contracts are contracts relating to either the execution, or both the design and execution, for the contracting authority, of works or of a work which is the outcome of building or civil engineering works and is intended itself to fulfil an economic or technical function, or of a work which is of immediate economic benefit to the contracting authority and is carried out by third parties in accordance with the requirements specified by that authority.'

31 Paragraph 99 was also to be extended by insertion of a new subparagraph 6, containing the following definition of a public works concession:

'A works concession is a contract relating to the execution of a works contract in which the consideration for the works does not consist in payment but in the right to exploit the building concerned for a fixed period or, as the case may be, in that right together with payment.'

32 Shortly after the present reference for a preliminary ruling had been made, amendments in those terms were introduced by the Law on the modernisation of public procurement law (Gesetz zur Modernisierung des Vergaberechts) of 20 April 2009 (BGBl. 2009 I, p. 790).

33 In those circumstances, the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Is it a requirement, in order for there to be a public works contract under Article 1(2)(b) of … Directive [2004/18] …, that the works be physically carried out for the public contracting authority and bring it an immediate economic benefit?

2. In so far as, according to the definition of a public works contract in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive [2004/18], the element of procurement is indispensable, is procurement to be regarded as having taken place, in accordance with the second variant of the provision, if the intended works for the public contracting authority fulfil a particular public purpose (for example, the development of part of a town) and the public contracting authority has the legal right under the contract to ensure that the public purpose is achieved and that the necessary works will be available?

3. Does the concept of a public works contract in accordance with the first and second variants of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive [2004/18] require that the contractor be directly or indirectly obliged to provide the works? If so, must there be a legally enforceable obligation?

4. Does the concept of a public works contract in accordance with the third variant of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive [2004/18] require that the contractor be obliged to carry out works, or that works form the subject-matter of the contract?

5. Do contracts by which, through the requirements specified by the public contracting authority, it is intended to ensure that the works to be carried out for a particular public purpose be available, and by which (by contractual stipulation) the contracting body is given the legal power to ensure

(in its own indirect interest) the availability of the works for the public purpose, fall within the third variant of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive [2004/18]?

6. Is the concept of "requirements specified by the contracting authority" in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive [2004/18] fulfilled if the works are to be carried out in accordance with plans examined and approved by the public contracting authority?

7. Must there be held to be no public works concession under Article 1(3) of Directive [2004/18] if the concessionaire is, or will become, the owner of the land on which the works are to be carried out, or the concession is granted for an indeterminate period?

8. Does Directive [2004/18] – with the legal consequence of an obligation on the public contracting authority to invite tenders – apply if a sale of land by a third party and the award of a public works contract take place at different times and on the conclusion of the land sale the public works contract has not yet been awarded, but at the last-mentioned time there was, on the part of the public authority, the intention to award such a contract?

9. Are separate but related transactions concerning a sale of land and [the award of] a public works contract to be regarded from the point of view of the law on the awarding of contracts as a unity, if at the time the land sale contract was entered into the award of a public works contract was intended and the participants deliberately created a close connection between the contracts from a substantive – and possibly also temporal – point of view (see Case C-29/04 Commission v Austria [2005] ECR I-9705)?'

Questions referred for a preliminary ruling

Preliminary observations

34 In most of the language versions of Directive 2004/18, there are three variants to the concept of 'public works contracts' provided for in Article 1(2)(b) of the directive. The first consists in the execution, which may be accompanied by the design, of building works falling within one of the categories listed in Annex I to the directive. The second concerns the execution, which may be accompanied by the design, of a work. The third variant is the realisation, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority.

35 A 'work', within the meaning of that provision, is defined as the 'outcome of building or civil engineering works taken as a whole which is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic or technical function'.

36 While the majority of the language versions use the term 'work' for both the second and the third variants, the German version uses two different terms, that is to say, 'Bauwerk' (work) for the second variant and 'Bauleistung' (building activity) for the third.

37 In addition, the German version of Article 1(2)(b) is the only one which provides that the activity referred to in the third variant must be realised not only 'by whatever means' but also 'by third parties' ('durch Dritte').

38 It is settled case-law that the wording used in one language version of a provision of European Union law cannot serve as the sole basis for the interpretation of that provision, or be made to override the other language versions in that regard. Such an approach would be incompatible with the requirement for uniform application of European Union law. Where there is divergence between the various language versions, the provision in question must be interpreted by reference to the purpose and general scheme of the rules of which it forms part (see Case C-372/88 Cricket St Thomas [1990] ECR I-1345, paragraphs 18 and 19; Case C-149/97 Institute of the Motor Industry [1998] ECR I-7053, paragraph 16; and Case C-239/07 Sabatauskas and Others [2008] ECR I-7523, paragraphs 38 and 39).

39 The questions submitted by the referring court must be answered in the light of those considerations.

First and second questions

40 By its first two questions, which it is appropriate to consider together, the referring court asks, in essence, whether the concept of 'public works contracts', within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, requires that the works which are the subject of the contract be physically carried out for the contracting authority in its immediate economic interest or whether it is sufficient if the works fulfil a public purpose, such as the development of part of a town.

41 It should be noted at the outset that the sale to an undertaking, by a public authority, of undeveloped land or land which has already been built upon does not constitute a public works contract within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18. First, such a contract requires that the public authority assume the position of purchaser and not seller. Second, the objective of such a contract must be the execution of works.

42 The provisions of Article 16(a) of Directive 2004/18 confirm that analysis.

43 Consequently, a sale, such as the sale in the main proceedings of Wittekind barracks by the Bundesanstalt to GSSI, cannot of itself constitute a public works contract within the meaning Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18.

44 Those questions submitted by the referring court do not, however, refer to that seller-purchaser relationship, but are directed rather at the relationship between the municipality of Wildeshausen and GSSI, that is to say, to the relationship between the public authority with town-planning powers and the purchaser of Wittekind barracks. The referring court wishes to know whether that relationship may constitute a public works contract within the meaning of that provision.

45 In that regard, it should be pointed out that, under Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18, 'public contracts' are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing.

46 The concept of a contract is essential for the purpose of defining the scope of Directive 2004/18. As stated in recital 2 in the preamble to that directive, its purpose is to apply the rules of European Union law to the award of contracts concluded on behalf of the State, regional or local authorities and other bodies governed by public law entities. The directive does not refer to other types of activities for which public authorities are responsible.

47 In addition, only a contract concluded for pecuniary interest may constitute a public contract coming within the scope of Directive 2004/18.

48 The pecuniary nature of the contract means that the contracting authority which has concluded a public works contract receives a service pursuant to that contract in return for consideration. That service consists in the realisation of works from which the contracting authority intends to benefit (see Case C-399/98 Ordine degli Architetti and Others [2001] ECR I-5409, paragraph 77, and Case C-220/05 Auroux and Others [2007] ECR I-385, paragraph 45).

49 Such a service, by its nature and in view of the scheme and objectives of Directive 2004/18, must be of direct economic benefit to the contracting authority.

50 That economic benefit is clearly established where it is provided that the public authority is to become owner of the works or work which is the subject of the contract.

51 Such an economic benefit may also be held to exist where it is provided that the contracting authority is to hold a legal right over the use of the works which are the subject of the contract, in order that they can be made available to the public (see, to that effect, Ordine degli Architetti and Others, paragraphs 67, 71 and 77).

52 The economic benefit may also lie in the economic advantages which the contracting authority may derive from the future use or transfer of the work, in the fact that it contributed financially to the realisation of the work, or in the assumption of the risks were the work to be an economic failure (see, to that effect, Auroux and Others, paragraphs 13, 17, 18 and 45).

53 The Court has already held that an agreement by which a first contracting authority entrusts a second contracting authority with the execution of a work may constitute a public works contract, regardless of whether or not it is anticipated that the first contracting authority is, or will become, the owner of all or part of that work (Auroux and Others, paragraph 47).

54 It follows from the foregoing that the concept of 'public works contracts' within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18 requires that the works which are the subject of the contract be carried out for the contracting authority's immediate economic benefit; it is not, however, necessary that the service should take the form of the acquisition of a material or physical object.

55 The question arises as to whether those conditions are satisfied where the purpose of the intended works is to fulfil an objective in the public interest, the achievement of which is incumbent on the contracting authority, such as the development or coherent planning of part of an urban district.

56 In the Member States of the European Union, the execution of building projects, at least those of a certain size, is normally subject to prior authorisation by the public authority having urban-planning powers. That authority must assess, in the exercise of its regulatory powers, whether the execution of the works is in the public interest.

57 However, it is not the purpose of the mere exercise of urban-planning powers, intended to give effect to the public interest, to obtain a contractual service or immediate economic benefit for the contracting authority, as is required under Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18.

58 Consequently, the answer to the first and second questions is that the concept of 'public works contracts', within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, does not require that the works which are the subject of the contract be materially or physically carried out for the contracting authority, provided that they are carried out for that authority's immediate economic benefit. The latter condition is not satisfied through the exercise by that contracting authority of regulatory urban-planning powers.

Third and fourth questions

59 By its third and fourth questions, which it is appropriate to examine together, the referring court asks, in essence, whether the concept of 'public works contracts', within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, requires that the contractor be under a direct or indirect obligation to carry out the works which are the subject of the contract and that that obligation be legally enforceable.

60 As has been pointed out in paragraphs 45 and 47 of the present judgment, Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18 defines a public works contract as a contract for pecuniary interest. That concept is based on the premise that the contractor undertakes to carry out the service which is the subject of the contract in return for consideration. By concluding a public works contract, the contractor therefore undertakes to carry out, or to have carried out, the works which form the subject of that contract.

61 It is irrelevant whether the contractor carries out the works itself or uses subcontractors for that purpose (see, to that effect, Ordine degli Architetti and Others, paragraph 90, and Auroux and Others, paragraph 44).

62 Since the obligations under the contract are legally binding, their execution must be legally enforceable. In the absence of rules provided for under European Union law, and in accordance with the principle of procedural autonomy, the detailed rules governing implementation of those obligations are a matter for national law.

63 Consequently, the answer to the third and fourth questions is that the concept of 'public works contracts', within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, requires that the contractor assume a direct or indirect obligation to carry out the works which are the subject of the contract and that that obligation be legally enforceable in accordance with the procedural rules laid down by national law.

Fifth and sixth questions

64 By its fifth and sixth questions, which it is appropriate to examine together, the referring court asks, in essence, whether the ‘requirements specified by the public contracting authority’, within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, may consist either in the contracting authority’s exercise of the power to ensure that the work to be carried out addresses a public interest or in the exercise of the power which it is recognised as having to examine and approve building plans.

65 Those questions arise from the fact that, in the case in the main proceedings, the presumed contracting authority, that is to say, the municipality of Wildeshausen, did not draw up a list of requirements relating to work to be carried out on the land occupied by Wittekind barracks. According to the order for reference, that municipality merely decided that it was minded to examine the project presented by GSSI and to embark on the procedure of drawing up a corresponding building plan.

66 However, the third variant set out in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18 provides that the objective of public works contracts is the realisation of a ‘work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority’.

67 In order for it to be possible to establish that a contracting authority has specified its requirements within the meaning of that provision, the authority must have taken measures to define the type of the work or, at the very least, have had a decisive influence on its design.

68 The mere fact that a public authority, in the exercise of its urban-planning powers, examines certain building plans presented to it, or takes a decision applying its powers in that sphere, does not satisfy the obligation that there be ‘requirements specified by the contracting authority’, within the meaning of that provision.

69 The answer to the fifth and sixth questions is, therefore, that the ‘requirements specified by the contracting authority’, within the meaning of the third variant set out in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, cannot consist in the mere fact that a public authority examines certain building plans submitted to it or takes a decision in the exercise of its regulatory urban-planning powers.

Seventh question

70 By its seventh question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether a public works concession, within the meaning of Article 1(3) of Directive 2004/18, is excluded in the case where the sole economic operator to which the concession can be granted already owns the land on which the work is to be carried out, or where the concession was granted for an indeterminate period.

71 Under Article 1(3) of Directive 2004/18, a public works concession ‘is a contract of the same type as a public works contract except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment’.

72 In order for a contracting authority to be able to transfer to the other contracting party the right to exploit a work within the terms of that provision, that contracting authority must be in a position to exploit that work.

73 That will normally not be the case where the only basis for the right of exploitation is the right of ownership of the economic operator concerned.

74 The owner of land has the right to exploit that land in compliance with the applicable statutory rules. As long as an economic operator enjoys the right to exploit the land which he owns, it is in principle impossible for a public authority to grant a concession relating to that exploitation.

75 It should, in addition, be pointed out that the essential characteristic of the concession is that it is the concessionaire himself who bears the main, or at least the substantial, operating risk (see to that effect, with regard to concessions relating to public services, Case C-206/08 Eurawasser [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 59 and 77).

76 The Commission of the European Communities submits that that risk may lie in the concessionaire’s uncertainty as to whether the urban-planning service of the local authority concerned will, or will not, approve its plans.

77 That argument cannot be accepted.

78 In the type of scenario referred to by the Commission, the risk would be linked to the contracting authority's regulatory powers in respect of urban planning and not to the contractual relationship arising from the concession. Consequently, the risk is not linked to exploitation.

79 In any event, with regard to the duration of concessions, there are serious grounds, including the need to guarantee competition, for holding the grant of concessions of unlimited duration to be contrary to the European Union legal order, as stated by the Advocate General in points 96 and 97 of his Opinion (see, to the same effect, Case C-454/06 pressetext Nachrichtenagentur [2008] ECR I-4401, paragraph 73).

80 Consequently, the answer to the seventh question is that, in circumstances such as those of the case in the main proceedings, there is no public works concession within the meaning of Article 1(3) of Directive 2004/18.

Eighth and ninth questions

81 The eighth and ninth questions submitted by the referring court should be examined together. By its eighth question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether the provisions of Directive 2004/18 apply to a situation in which one public authority sells land to an undertaking, even though another public authority intends to award a works contract in respect of that land without yet having formally decided to award that contract. The ninth question concerns the possibility of regarding as a unity, from a legal point of view, the sale of the land and the subsequent award of a works contract in respect of that land.

82 In that regard, it is prudent not to exclude from the outset the application of Directive 2004/18 to a two-phase award procedure in the form of the sale of land which will subsequently form the subject of a works contract, by considering those transactions as a unity.

83 However, there is nothing in the circumstances of the case in the main proceedings to confirm that the prerequisites for such an application of that directive exist.

84 As submitted by the French Government in its written observations, the parties to the main proceedings did not assume any legally binding contractual obligations.

85 First, the municipality of Wildeshausen and GSSI did not assume any obligations of such a nature.

86 Second, GSSI did not give any undertaking to carry out the plans for the economic development of the land which it had purchased.

87 Finally, there is no evidence in the notarial deeds of sale to indicate that the award of a public works contract was imminent.

88 The intentions revealed by the documents in the case-file do not constitute binding obligations and cannot in any way satisfy the requirement of a written contract which is inherent in the very concept of a public contract set out in Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18.

89 The answer to the eighth and ninth questions is therefore that, in circumstances such as those of the case in the main proceedings, the provisions of Directive 2004/18 do not apply to a situation in which one public authority sells land to an undertaking, even though another public authority intends to award a works contract in respect of that land but has not yet formally decided to award that contract.

Costs

90 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby rules:

1. The concept of 'public works contracts', within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts, does not require that the works which are the subject of the contract be materially or physically carried out for the contracting authority, provided that they are carried out for that authority's immediate economic benefit. The latter condition is not satisfied by the exercise by that contracting authority of regulatory urban-planning powers.

2. The concept of 'public works contracts', within the meaning of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, requires that the contractor assume a direct or indirect obligation to carry out the works which are the subject of the contract and that that obligation be legally enforceable in accordance with the procedural rules laid down by national law.

3. The 'requirements specified by the contracting authority', within the meaning of the third variant set out in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, cannot consist in the mere fact that a public authority examines certain building plans submitted to it or takes a decision in the exercise of its regulatory urban-planning powers.

4. In circumstances such as those of the case in the main proceedings, there is no public works concession within the meaning of Article 1(3) of Directive 2004/18.

5. In circumstances such as those of the case in the main proceedings, the provisions of Directive 2004/18 do not apply to a situation in which one public authority sells land to an undertaking, even though another public authority intends to award a works contract in respect of that land but has not yet formally decided to award that contract.

delivered on 17 November 2009 1

Case C-451/08

Helmut Müller GmbH
v
Bundesanstalt für Immobilienaufgaben

(Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf (Germany))

(Public works contracts – Public works concessions – Sale of land by a public authority – Works to be carried out subsequently)

1. The present case, arising from a number of questions referred by the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf (Higher Regional Court, Düsseldorf) for a preliminary ruling, allows the Court to address once again the problem of the distinction between public works contracts and public authorities' town planning activities.

2. To be more precise, the central point at issue in the case on which the referring court is required to rule is the sale of land by a public authority to a private person. Typically, a case of this kind may raise the question of possible State aid. (2) In the present case, however, that question does not seem to arise. On the contrary, the specific point at issue is the fact that the public authority decided to sell the land to the prospective buyer who, in the opinion of the local authorities responsible for town planning, presented the best and most interesting plans for the use of the land and the erection of buildings. The referring court asks whether the rules on public contracts and, more specifically, the rules on public works concessions apply in these circumstances.

I – Legislative context

3. The provisions on which the Court is asked to deliver a ruling are contained in Directive 2004/18/EC (3) (hereinafter also referred to as 'the Directive').

4. Article 1 of the Directive provides:

'1. For the purposes of this Directive, the definitions set out in paragraphs 2 to 15 shall apply.

2. (a) "Public contracts" are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive.

(b) “Public works contracts” are public contracts having as their object either the execution, or both the design and execution, of works related to one of the activities within the meaning of Annex I or a work, or the realisation, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority. A “work” means the outcome of building or civil engineering works taken as a whole which is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic or technical function.

3. “Public works concession” is a contract of the same type as a public works contract except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment.

II – The facts, the main proceedings, and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

5. In October 2006, the Bundesanstalt für Immobilienaufgaben (the federal agency responsible for managing public property; ‘the Bundesanstalt’) published notices in the press and on the internet announcing its intention to sell land comprising approximately 24 hectares in the municipality of Wildeshausen. The land was occupied, inter alia, by barracks which were decommissioned early in 2007.

6. The notice published by the Bundesanstalt stated that the proposed use of the land must be agreed in advance with the municipality of Wildeshausen.

7. In May 2007, a survey commissioned by the Bundesanstalt estimated the value of the land to be EUR 2.33 million.

8. One company, Helmut Müller GmbH (‘Helmut Müller’), made an offer in November 2006 to buy the land for EUR 4 million on condition that the building plans for the area were drawn up in accordance with its designs. That proposal was not pursued.

9. In January 2007, the Bundesanstalt asked interested parties to make offers for the land without any definite building plan. In that context, Helmut Müller made an offer to buy the land for EUR 1 million. Another company, Gut Spascher Sand Immobilien GmbH (‘GSSI’), made an offer to buy the land for EUR 2.5 million.

10. The municipality of Wildeshausen subsequently asked the prospective buyers to submit their own plans for the use of the area. Those plans were then discussed with the municipal authorities in the presence of the Bundesanstalt. On 24 May 2007, the Wildeshausen town council expressed its own preference for the plan submitted by GSSI and said it was prepared to embark on the formal procedure of drawing up the building plans for the area on the basis of that plan. The town council explicitly stated in its decision that its preference was not to be regarded as binding with respect to local planning powers, which the town council reserved the right to exercise at its discretion.

11. On 6 June 2007, the Bundesanstalt sold the land to GSSI. The contract of sale does not mention the future use of the land.

12. Helmut Müller brought proceedings before the national courts, contesting the sale of the land and claiming in particular that the sale should have been conducted in accordance with the rules on public procurement.

13. The dispute is before the referring court, which has referred the following questions for a preliminary ruling:

‘(1) Is it a requirement, in order for there to be a public works contract under Article 1(2)(b) of … Directive 2004/18/EC …, that the works be physically carried out for the public contracting authority and bring it an immediate economic benefit?

(2) In so far as, according to the definition of a public works contract in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18/EC, the element of procurement is indispensable, is procurement to be regarded as having taken place, in accordance with the second variant of the provision, if the intended works for the public contracting authority fulfil a particular public purpose (for example the development of part of a town) and the public contracting authority has the legal right under the contract to ensure that the public purpose is achieved and that the necessary works will be available?

(3) Does the concept of a public works contract in accordance with the first and second variants of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18/EC require that the contractor be directly or indirectly obliged to provide the works. If so, must there be a legally enforceable obligation?

(4) Does the concept of a public works contract in accordance with the third variant of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18/EC require that the contractor be obliged to carry out works, or that works form the subject-matter of the contract?

(5) Do contracts by which, through the requirements specified by the public contracting authority, it is intended to ensure that the works to be carried out for a particular public purpose be available, and by which (by contractual stipulation) the contracting body is given the legal power to ensure (in its own indirect interest) the availability of the works for the public purpose, fall within the third variant of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18/EC?

(6) Is the concept of "requirements specified by the contracting authority" in Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18/EC fulfilled, if the works are to be carried out in accordance with plans examined and approved by the public contracting authority?

(7) Must there be held to be no public works concession under Article 1(3) of Directive 2004/18/EC, if the concessionaire is or will become the owner of the land on which the works are to be carried out, or the concession is granted for an indeterminate period?

(8) Does Directive 2004/18/EC – with the legal consequence of an obligation on the public contracting authority to invite tenders – apply if a sale of land by a third party and the award of a public works contract take place at different times and on the conclusion of the land sale the public works contract has not yet been awarded, but at the last-mentioned time there was, on the part of the public authority, the intention to award such a contract?

(9) Are separate but related transactions concerning a sale of land and a public works contract to be regarded from the point of view of the law on the awarding of contracts as a unity, if at the time the land sale contract was entered into the award of a public works contract was intended and the participants deliberately created a close connection between the contracts from a substantive – and possibly also temporal – point of view (see Case C-29/04 Commission v Austria [2005] ECR I-9705)?'

III – Preliminary observations

A – The case-law of the referring court

14. Some clarification is required in order to understand the questions raised by the referring court. In particular, it should be observed that the national court itself makes it clear in the order for reference that the current case-law of the referring court (the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf) differs in some respects from most of the case-law and the legal literature on the law relating to the award of public contracts.

15. In particular, the referring court's position is based on the assumption that the fact that a procedure is essentially a town planning procedure does not in principle preclude the application of the Community rules on public contracts. The national court refers in this connection to the Court's judgments in Ordine degli Architetti and Others (4) and Commission v France. (5)

16. Secondly, the referring court deduces from the judgment in Auroux and Others (6) the principle that the application of the Community rules on public contracts is completely independent of whether the contracting authority intends to become the owner of the works to be constructed, or to take possession and make use of them at all. In other words, the Community rules on public contracts may apply regardless of whether there is an element of procurement of property by the contracting authority. In particular, the benefit pursued by the contracting authority may also be immaterial, consisting for example, as in the present case, in achieving specific urban development aims in respect of municipal land. (7)

17. On the basis of that case-law, the situation that is the subject of the main proceedings is interpreted by the referring court in the following terms. In its view, GSSI was awarded a public works concession, (8) to which the relevant provisions of Community law were applicable. (9) The fact that GSSI acquired a right of ownership in the property in question is not, in its view, inconsistent with that interpretation, since the concept of a 'concession' as defined in the Directive does not exclude concessions of indefinite duration or recognition of the concessionaire's right to own the property that is the subject of the concession.

18. According to the referring court, the fact that the municipality of Wildeshausen, although it had expressed its own preference for the development scheme proposed by GSSI, was not formally bound to authorise that scheme does not call into question its interpretation of the events. In particular, the national court cites the Court's judgment in Commission v Austria ('Mödling') (10) to support the claim that even an event which occurred after the award may, if it was actually decisive for the purposes of the award, have to be taken into account for the purposes of a legal assessment of the facts. Any other course might well compromise the effectiveness of provisions of Community law.

19. However, as I pointed out earlier, the referring court itself recognises that its interpretation of Community law, in the parts that are applicable in the present case, is by no means unanimously accepted. By its questions, the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf is therefore essentially asking the Court to determine whether or not that interpretation is correct.

B – The differences between the various language versions of Article 1 of the Directive

20. In most of the languages, (11) Article 1 of the Directive identifies three different types of 'public works contract'. These are, in particular:

– the execution, possibly accompanied by the design, of building works (12) of the type specified in Annex I to the Directive (first variant);

– the execution, possibly accompanied by the design, of awork (13) (second variant);

– the realisation, by whatever means, of a work (14) corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority (third variant).

21. The Directive adds that a 'work' (15) means the outcome of building or civil engineering works taken as a whole which is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic or technical function.

22. It should be noted at once that there are some important differences between the language versions.

23. First, there are differences resulting from occasional inconsistencies in the terminology used in the three variants mentioned above: this is clear, in particular, when one looks at the terms employed in some of the language versions as indicated in the footnotes on the variants in question.

24. In addition, the German version exhibits two other significant differences. First, the third variant specifies that the activity in question is to be executed 'by third parties' (durch Dritte): that provision does not appear in the other language versions. (16) Secondly, the activity referred to in the third variant is not described as 'a work' (Bauwerk) but as 'building activity' (Bauleistung), with the result that the subsequent definition of 'a work' appears, in the German version, to apply only to the second variant and not to the third. (17)

25. The existence of these textual problems is a strong incentive for not attempting to find the ‘correct’ interpretation of provisions through a strictly literal analysis of the provisions in question, especially if that analysis is confined to a single language version. In fact, the only possible guides in seeking the meaning to be attributed to the provisions are systematic interpretation and teleological interpretation, combined with a good sense of interpretation.

IV – Legal analysis

A – Introduction: the concept of a public works contract

26. In order to give the fullest possible reply to the questions raised by the referring court, it is necessary, first, to identify the essential characteristics of a works contract.

27. It should be noted, first of all, that the concept is peculiar to Community law and the classification of a specific contract in the national law of a Member State is consequently irrelevant in this connection. (18)

28. As to the object of the contract, as we saw earlier, Directive 2004/18 identifies three basic types of contract. To summarise, it may be said that, under Article 1 of that Directive, the concept of a public works contract includes, on the one hand, the execution of specific works of the types listed in Annex I to the Directive and, on the other, the realisation of a work. In other words, the concept includes both construction activities, regardless of whether the outcome of the works constitutes a definite and/or finished property, and activities connected with the realisation, possibly by third parties, of specific ‘complete’ properties. Such a property, the ‘complete’ nature of which is identified by the Directive in the statement that it fulfils ‘an economic or technical function’, is normally defined as ‘a work’.

29. As regards the particular situations to be assessed, the question whether or not they fall within the ambit of Directive 2004/18 will naturally have to be examined case by case. However, I think that, generally speaking, the problem of whether the objective requirements for the application of the Directive are satisfied can be solved in most cases by adopting a flexible approach, based not on the threefold definition reflected in most language versions of Article 1 but rather on a twofold definition of works as expounded in the preceding point.

30. Regardless of the approach that is adopted, it must not however be forgotten that a characteristic element of all public works contracts is the element of construction. In other words, the activities in question must include the production of property. Indeed, the mere sale of existing property is explicitly excluded from the ambit of the Directive. (19)

31. Article 1 of the Directive explicitly defines other essential characteristics of a works contract. It is established that a works contract is a contract concluded in writing and for pecuniary interest. This entails a service provided by the contractor for the public authority for consideration, not necessarily in cash but certainly in terms of economic value. (20)

32. However, as we know, the Directive itself provides for an alternative to the ‘typical’ model in which the public authority pays (in the broad sense of the term, as we have seen) the builder for a work. In that alternative model, the public works concession model, ‘the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment’. According to the referring court, the provisions on the award of public works concessions are applicable in the present case, since the public authority simply allows the person who is to carry out certain building works to enjoy the full benefit of the outcome of the building activity, in accordance with the provisions on the right of ownership. That problem will be discussed in detail later, notably in connection with the analysis of the seventh question.

33. A further observation is also required concerning the aim pursued by the public authorities in the works and/or work which they intend to execute. As the Court has had occasion to rule, the aim is irrelevant for the purposes of the applicability of the provisions of the Directive. (21) Thus, the only thing that matters is whether the objective requirements specified in the measure are satisfied.

34. Clearly, the reason why the Community rules pay no attention to the aims pursued by the public authorities in specific individual cases is that, as the recitals in the preamble to the Directive suggest, the principal objective of the Community rules on public contracts is to abolish restrictions on fundamental freedoms and to encourage genuine competition. (22) Thus, the point of view is that of the persons who may be interested in carrying out the works and, for those persons, the aim that the public authority intends to pursue is irrelevant.

35. These broad and ambitious aims must be borne in mind when interpreting the Directive but it should not be assumed that, by appealing to the purpose of the measure, its scope can be extended indefinitely. In particular, it should be noted that certain specific sectors in which it does not apply are mentioned in the Directive itself, notably in Articles 10 to 16. A purely 'functional' interpretation, based exclusively on the fundamental objectives of the Directive, is therefore not permissible.

36. A 'functional' interpretation, which the Commission in particular appears to support, raises the crucial problem of identifying the parameters on the basis of which the Directive is to apply. However, the Commission itself has stated that its principal concern is that certain persons may acquire a benefit without first being placed on an equal footing with other persons who may be interested in acquiring the benefit in question. In cases such as the present one, the benefit consists in the increase in the value of land resulting from the fact that the public authority has given permission for certain building activities to be carried out on it. So, on the Commission's interpretation, any 'increase in value' of immovable property that is attributable to an activity of the public authorities should be subject to the provisions of the Directive. It is therefore clear that, if one takes that position, one may have to accept the hypothesis, however absurd, that all town planning activities are subject to the Directive since, by definition, provisions on the possible execution of building works substantially alter the value of the land in question.

37. In fact, no one actually takes that extreme position. However, it must be noted that it is the logical consequence of a purely functional interpretation of the Directive.

38. It is true, as we know, that in some areas the Court has adopted an openly 'functional' interpretation of the provisions of Community law. It has done so, in particular, in the context of the law on the award of public contracts, in connection with the concepts of a 'contracting authority' and a 'body governed by public law'. (23) However, it should be noted in this connection, first, that on those occasions the functional interpretation was used to clarify the meaning of a specific concept, not to determine the general scope of the entire body of legislation on public contracts. Moreover, in the cases cited, the purpose of adopting the functional interpretation was essentially to avoid creating enormous gaps that would have provided wide scope for abuse: I refer, for example, to a case where the typical function of a body governed by public law was subsequently incorporated in the establishment of a company without affecting its status, (24) or where a public service (a broadcasting body, in this case) was not financed directly out of public resources but through fees payable by persons who possessed a receiver. (25)

39. I therefore consider that, on the contrary, the scope of the Directive should be identified by reference, first, to the objective requirements specified in the Directive itself. That does not, of course, mean that all 'functional' considerations are to be avoided. In fact, the objectives pursued by the Directive are clearly among the principal points of reference for the purposes of interpretation. (26) They cannot however constitute the only reference parameter, nor can they escape the legislature's desire to define the scope of the measure.

40. I shall now proceed to examine the questions. In view of the logical connections between them, I shall start with the first, second, fifth and sixth questions.

B – The first and second questions

41. By the first two questions, which can be taken together, the referring court asks the Court whether, in general, in order for there to be a public works contract within the meaning of Directive 2004/18, it is necessary that the object of the contract constitute property procured by the public authority, which is of immediate economic benefit to that authority. If the answer is in the affirmative, that is to say, if, in the words of the referring court, 'the element of procurement is indispensable', it seeks to ascertain whether or not that element can be discerned in the general pursuit of a public purpose alone, for example in a specific scheme for the urban development of municipal land.

1. The positions of the parties

42. The positions taken by the parties which submitted observations in the present proceedings cover a fairly wide spectrum.

43. On the one hand, the German Government, supported on this point by the Bundesanstalt and to a large extent by the Austrian Government, firmly maintains that the presence of the element of procurement is essential to a public works contract. Indeed, it affirms that the procurement need not necessarily be material and that an economic benefit to the public authority may suffice. In its view, however, the general pursuit of a public purpose, as in the present case, is not in itself sufficient. As to the Court's judgment in Auroux and Others which, as we have seen, is a cornerstone of the position the national court is inclined to favour, the German Government observes that, in the case in which that decision was delivered, the question of immediate economic benefit to the public authority did not arise, so the Court did not consider it necessary to concentrate its attention on that point. However, in the German Government's view, that should certainly not be interpreted as meaning that the economic benefit requirement is unnecessary: that requirement, although not explicitly stated, is implicit in the general system of the Directive. As to the arguments based on the need to ensure that the Directive is effective and to prevent the risk of abuse, according to the German Government, those considerations cannot justify applying the Directive covertly in areas other than those to which it normally applies. The need to prevent abuses in areas other than public contracts should be addressed by employing other legislative instruments, not Directive 2004/18.

44. The position adopted by the Commission, on the other hand, is diametrically opposed to that of the German Government. In particular, according to the Commission, the only decisive element for the purpose of the answer to be given to the referring court is the fact that the wording of the Directive does not require the public authority to procure anything from any other person in order for there to be a public works contract. In its view, therefore, to insist on the presence of the element of procurement would mean introducing a condition that is not required by the wording of the measure in question.

45. Lastly, the position taken by the Netherlands Government is midway between the two. In its view, although it is not essential – even in the light of the Court's case-law – that the public authority procure the work, it must nevertheless have a direct economic interest in order for there to be a public works contract. In particular, that direct economic interest may, depending on the case, consist either in an economic benefit to the public authority or in what the Netherlands Government describes as a 'risk of loss' borne by that authority. In the Netherlands Government's view, there is no such economic interest in the case submitted to the referring court for examination, or at least no interest that can be detected on the basis of the information supplied by the national court.

2. Assessment

46. In my view, the correct interpretation of Directive 2004/18 is midway between the two 'extreme' positions taken by the German Government and the Commission respectively. On the other hand, I do not fully share the Netherlands Government's position, which seems to me to rely excessively on an economic element for the purpose of defining the concept of a public works contract.

47. It is important, in my view, for the purpose of replying to the question referred to the Court, to consider first the way in which the judgment in Auroux and Others should be interpreted. (27) As we know, in the case in which that decision was delivered, a municipal authority, without issuing an invitation to tender, had entrusted a second contracting authority with the execution of an urban development project. In that context, the second contracting authority, using funds provided in part by the municipality, was required to execute various building works, some of which were to be sold to third parties and some transferred to the municipal authority. The Court held that that transaction constituted a public works contract, regardless of whether or not it was anticipated that the first contracting authority, that is to say, the municipality, was or would become the owner of all or part of that work. (28)

48. It is true that, as the German Government observes, in that case there was no doubt that at least some of the works to be executed were of direct benefit to the municipal authority. However, it is also true that the somewhat broad wording that the Court chose to employ means, in my view, that there is no need to regard direct procurement for a public authority as a condition of a public works contract.

49. On the other hand, however, attention must be drawn to another feature of the facts at issue in that case: on that occasion, the municipal authority had paid a substantial sum of money and had been directly involved with the second contracting authority in securing the execution of the required works.

50. However necessary it may be to interpret the concept of a public works contract broadly in order to prevent possible abuses, the scope of that concept cannot, as I observed earlier, be extended indefinitely. (29) A 'functional' interpretation of this kind cannot completely disregard the limits to the scope of the Directive. While it is certainly true that the principal objective of the Directive on the award of public contracts is to encourage competition between undertakings and to open markets, it is also true that, in areas that are not within the scope of the Directive, that objective must be pursued by employing other appropriate legislative instruments, not by unduly extending the scope of the provisions on the award of public contracts.

51. It is therefore necessary to identify with some precision the limits to the scope of those provisions, which must represent absolute limits for the purpose of applying the provisions of the Directive.

52. In my view, it is possible from a full examination of the measure, bearing in mind the meaning that the Court has so far attributed to it, to deduce the fundamental principle that for a given activity to fall within the ambit of the law on public works contracts there must be a strong and direct link between the public authority and the work or works to be executed. That link normally follows from the fact that the work or works are executed on the public authority's initiative.

53. Contrary to the view taken by the referring court, non-material and indirect benefit alone is not sufficient. Nor is the mere fact that the activity to be assessed is, generally, in the public interest sufficient. It should be noted that, in cases where a permit for the activity has to be issued by a public authority (which is normally the case with all building activities), the activity must obviously be in the public interest in order to obtain a permit, since the public interest is the reference parameter on which the public authorities grant permission. Unless the scope of the Directive is extended indefinitely, the general existence of a public interest which justifies permission to pursue the activity cannot therefore constitute the decisive criterion for determining which cases are to fall within it. In particular, it must be borne in mind that a building permit, that is to say, the typical expression of the authorities' powers in the objective area of town planning, is usually confined to removing restrictions on a private initiative, not a public initiative.

54. I therefore take the view that by requiring that there be a direct link between the public authority and the work or works to be executed it is possible to reconcile the potential contradiction between the need to prevent abuses on the one hand and the need to avoid extending the scope of the Directive indefinitely on the other. In particular, that formula is completely consistent with the Court's finding in Auroux and Others that the procurement of the works by the authority is not a necessary condition for the application of the provisions on public contracts. That judgment cannot however be used to justify an approach that dispenses altogether with a strong connection between the public authorities and the works to be executed: the very criterion of a direct link may, in my view, constitute an appropriate expression of that necessary connection.

55. That direct link is clearly discernible, first, in situations where the public authority immediately acquires ownership of the property to be produced. This is obviously the most typical case and most of the cases in which the Directive is applicable are covered by this reference model. There are also situations, similar to that typical situation, where the property to be produced is not procured by the public authority but is nevertheless of immediate economic benefit to that authority. This may be the case, for example, where the public authorities acquire a right in building property which, although not a right of ownership, nevertheless enables them to make use of the property, at least to some extent.

56. A second example of a direct link between the public authority and the work or works to be executed may, in my view, be identified in cases where the public authority employs public resources for the execution of the work and/or works. In most cases, these situations are clearly covered by the first example mentioned in the preceding point since, in the classic model of the use of public resources for the execution of work or works, that is to say, the contract model, the public authorities pay in order to acquire ownership of the property to be produced. Moreover, as we have seen, public resources may be used in the concession model too, though not to cover the whole value of the work or works to be executed.

57. However, the second example also covers situations where the public authority disburses money or other public resources but does not acquire ownership of the property to be produced. As the Court held in Auroux and Others, ownership is not an essential element. Moreover, it appears to be perfectly consistent with the requirements of equity and compliance with the fundamental principles of the Directive that, when the public authorities intend to employ public resources, the selection of the persons who are to receive those resources should be accompanied by the guarantees provided by the Directive.

58. It goes without saying that that example also includes situations where the public resources that are employed are not of a pecuniary nature: I am thinking, for example, of cases where, for the purpose of carrying out the work or works, public land is made available to the contractor or concessionaire free of charge or at a price below the market price.

59. A third and last example of a direct link between the public authority and the work or works to be carried out concerns cases where the work and/or works, whether or not they are examples of the first or second kind, are in any case the result of an initiative taken by the authority in question. This is the case, in particular, where the public authorities start, on their own initiative, a procedure which leads to the execution or realisation of the work or works. An example of this kind of situation is the situation assessed by the Court in Auroux and Others. (30)

60. However, the third and last example calls for clarification in an important respect. The activity pursued by the public authority in that context must extend beyond mere exercise of the general powers vested in that authority with respect to town planning. That is the only way to draw a clear line between activities which fall within the scope of the Directive and ‘normal’ town planning activities which, as such, do not. To be precise, the type of activity pursued by the public authority in specific individual cases must be assessed by the national court on a case-by-case basis.

61. Within that framework, the possibility cannot be ruled out that the realisation of a certain scheme for the development of land may be the subject of a contract that falls within the scope of the Directive. Such a possibility requires, however, that there be a direct link, in the sense indicated in the preceding points, between the public authority and the work or works to be carried out. The mere pursuit of the public interest through recourse to ordinary town planning powers is not sufficient cause to apply the Community rules on contracts and concessions.

62. In this case, it is naturally for the referring court to determine whether or not that direct link exists. I should point out however that, on the basis of the information supplied to the Court by the national court, it seems to me difficult to maintain that the direct link exists. On the one hand, it appears to be common ground that the public authority will not acquire any property in this case and will not obtain any immediate economic benefit. Nor does this appear to be an instance of any of the other situations in which a direct link could be detected, since the municipality of Wildeshausen did not take a specific initiative in connection with the execution of the works, confining itself on the contrary to assessing the various projects that were submitted to it, nor did it have to meet any expenses in connection with the construction work. No connections of this kind appear to be discernible in the case of the Bundesanstalt either.

C – The fifth and sixth questions

63. The fifth and sixth questions relate only to the third ‘variant’ of the concept of a public works contract (31) and to some extent they restate, with reference to that variant, the problems raised in connection with the first two questions, particularly the second question.

64. To be precise, by the fifth question the referring court seeks to ascertain whether the ‘requirements specified by the public contracting authority’ referred to in the said variant consist simply in the fact that the public authority has the power to ensure that the works to be executed correspond to a public interest.

65. By the sixth question, on the other hand, the Court is asked to determine whether the said ‘requirements specified by the contracting authority’ may in fact consist in the power vested in the public authority to examine and approve building plans.

1. Arguments of the parties

66. With the sole and obvious exception of Helmut Müller, all the parties which submitted observations agree in principle that, in a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings, the conditions required for there to be a public works contract within the meaning of the third variant are not met.

67. To be precise, the Commission and the Netherlands and French Governments stress the need to distinguish between an ‘active’ role, in which the public authorities take the initiative or exercise a decisive influence on the execution of the work, and a purely ‘passive’ role, in which they confine themselves to the functions of approving and monitoring projects promoted by private persons. This, it is suggested, does not constitute a public contract but represents at the very most a case of the public authorities exercising their normal functions of planning, approval, monitoring, and so forth.

68. The German Government, for its part, takes a position based on the view that the conditions which it considers to be essential in the case of both the first two variants of the concept of a public works contract, including in particular the requirement of an immediate economic benefit for the public authority, are also essential in the case of the third variant of that concept.

2. Assessment

69. The referring court’s decision, when framing the questions to be put to the Court, to separate the issues connected with the first two variants of the concept of a public works contract, which are the subject of the second question in particular, from the issues connected with the third variant, which are at the centre of the fifth and sixth questions, is based, in my view, on the wish to infer from the wording of the third variant that the scope of the Directive is very wide.

70. There is no doubt, as the Commission has emphasised in its observations, that the third variant of the concept of a public works contract was in fact designed to prevent avoidance of the application of the legislation by including in the concept cases of various kinds which could not be exhaustively identified in advance.

71. However, as I observed earlier, the wording of the measure cannot be used to extend its scope indefinitely. In particular, if the ‘requirements specified by the contracting authority’ were to include all the public authorities’ approval and planning functions in the area of urban development, the scope of the Directive would be unduly extended.

72. In fact, the considerations which I advanced earlier in connection with the first two questions also apply to the third variant. There is no reason to suppose, with reference to the third variant, that it is possible to dispense with the requirement, for the purposes of Directive 2004/18, of a direct link between the public authority and the works to be executed.

D – Partial conclusions

73. Concluding my analysis of the first, second, fifth and sixth questions, I therefore suggest that the Court’s answer to these questions should be that, in order for there to be a public works contract or a public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18, there must be a direct link between the public contracting authority and the work or works to be carried out. That direct link may consist, in particular, in the fact that the works are to be carried out for the public contracting authority or that they bring it an immediate economic benefit, or in the fact that the public contracting authority has taken the initiative for the execution of the works or bears at least some of the costs in that connection.

E – The third and fourth questions

74. By the third and fourth questions, the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf essentially asks whether the concept of a public works contract necessarily implies that the contractor is obliged to carry out the work or works. The reason for these apparently singular questions is that, in the case at issue before the national court, it is common ground that the purchaser of the land was not under any obligation to build on it.

75. Almost all the parties which have submitted observations are generally agreed that the answer to these questions should be in the affirmative, and there appear to be no substantial differences between their respective positions. Only Helmut Müller, the plaintiff in the main proceedings, suggests for obvious reasons that, on the contrary, the Court should accept the referring court's approach, according to which the obligation in question is not essential.

76. In my view, however, it is clear that the answer to the questions should be in the affirmative and that the obligation to carry out the work and/or works constitutes an essential element in order for there to be a public works contract or a public works concession.

77. This follows, first and foremost, from the provisions of Directive 2004/18 itself which, as we have seen, defines public works contracts as contracts for pecuniary interest. The concept is therefore based on the idea of an exchange of services between the contracting authority, which pays a price (or, alternatively, grants a right of use), and the contractor, who is required to execute a work or works. Thus, public contracts are clearly mutually binding. It would obviously be inconsistent with that characteristic to accept that, after being awarded a contract, a contractor could, without any repercussions, simply decide unilaterally not to carry out the specified work. Otherwise, it would mean that contractors were entitled to exercise discretion with regard to the requirements and needs of the contracting authority.

78. A different and conceptually separate question that is also raised by the referring court is whether or not, in order for there to be a public works contract, any obligation assumed by the contractor vis-à-vis the public authority must be legally enforceable. That is to say, the national court is asking whether, if the work is not done, the contracting authority can institute legal proceedings to oblige the contractor to do it.

79. If, by putting the question in this form, the referring court's intention is to ask the Court whether, in connection with works contracts within the meaning of Directive 2004/18, the national legal order must necessarily provide mechanisms to oblige contractors to carry out the work or works specified in the contract, I consider that the answer should be in the negative, since it is impossible to find any indication to that effect in the Directive.

80. However, that does not mean that the contractor's failure to fulfil obligations is irrelevant. It should not be forgotten that, as I pointed out earlier, a public works contract is to all intents and purposes a contract, that is to say, a legal document which, in all the variety of national legal systems, is by nature binding at all times and in all circumstances. As the German Government rightly points out in its observations, in order for there to be a public works contract, the contractor must be under a contractual obligation to provide the specified service. However, the consequences of any failure to fulfil obligations are a matter of national law: for example, in the event of a contractor failing to fulfil obligations, there is nothing to prevent the national law of a State from providing that the contract is to be terminated, that it is to be awarded to another contractor, and that the public authority is entitled simply to require the first contractor to compensate for any loss or damage.

81. I therefore propose that the Court's answer to the third and fourth questions should be that the concepts of a public works contract and a public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18 presuppose that the contractor is under a contractual obligation to the public authority to provide the agreed service. It is for national law to determine the consequences of any failure by the contractor to fulfil obligations.

F – The seventh question

82. By the seventh question, the referring court ask whether there can be a public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18 if the 'concessionaire' holds a right of ownership which by definition confers the right to use the property that is the object of the concession. (32) More generally, the question concerns the admissibility under Community law of a concession of unlimited duration.

1. The positions of the parties

83. The clearest position on the problem is that of the German Government, which generally rules out the possibility of the institution of concessions being compatible with the existence of a right of ownership. The reason for this is that a concession implies, by definition, that the grantor owns the rights which are transferred to the concessionaire.

84. The Netherlands and Austrian Governments, for their part, while not absolutely excluding the possibility of concessions being compatible with a right of ownership, consider that in the present case the public authority's role is too limited for there to be a concession. For there to be a concession, the public authorities would, in their view, have at the very least to give the concessionaire precise instructions concerning the work and/or works to be carried out.

85. The Commission is the only party to take a more open position. In particular, on the ground that the characteristic element of a works concession is the fact that the concessionaire bears the economic risk connected with the execution of the work or works, the Commission considers that the economic risk in the present case is to be detected in the concessionaire's uncertainty as to whether the public authority would accept the building plans, for which the land had to be purchased in advance.

2. Assessment

86. The seventh question is in some ways the most difficult, at least in one important respect. The problem of compatibility between public works concessions and the right of ownership has significant theoretical and practical implications.

87. There are various reasons why a public authority may opt for a public works concession. In some cases, the decision may be prompted by a desire to take advantage of specific experience available in the private sector or to construct building works more efficiently. However, there is no doubt that, in most cases, the choice of a concession meets financial requirements. By employing that arrangement, it is possible to carry out works of public interest without placing a burden on the public purse. (33)

88. By its very definition, a concession is a way of allowing a person to exploit property to which that person could not otherwise claim any right.

89. Directive 2004/18, for its part, simply speaks in the definition of public works concessions of 'the right to exploit the work' by way of consideration for the person responsible for constructing it.

90. However, in so far as the 'right to exploit' may be interpreted broadly, one possibility which I consider ought to be excluded, in view of the meaning and the general system of the measure in question, is the possibility of a public works concession in which the concessionaire has a right of ownership in the finished works.

91. In the first place, as the German Government in particular has observed, the fact that the Directive speaks of the concessionaire's right to exploit the works would logically seem to imply that the concessionaire cannot have a more extensive right, such as the right of ownership, in the property.

92. Moreover, apart from being difficult to reconcile with the wording of the provision concerned, such a situation would deprive the public authorities of what seems to me to be one of the essential characteristics of public works concessions: the opportunity for the public authority eventually to take possession of the finished works, even if only to reassign the right to exploit them.

93. In other words, the problem arises not so much from the objective characteristics of the right of ownership in connection with the possibility of exploiting the property, as from the potentially unlimited duration of that right. Consequently, the exploitation entrusted to the concessionaire can never be granted for an unlimited period of time, regardless of the legal title by virtue of which it may be exercised.

94. It must also be borne in mind that, in the typical model of concessions under Community law, the crucial distinctive element which serves in particular to distinguish concessions from public contracts is that there is an economic risk to be borne by the concessionaire in the case of concessions whereas there is no such risk in the case of public contracts. (34) In the present case, in order to determine that there is a risk of this kind, the Commission has to attribute it to the fact that, after the persons concerned have purchased the land, the public authorities in the exercise of their town planning functions may refuse to grant building permits for the proposed works. However, the 'chance' of that happening appears to be not so much a risk associated with the economic exploitation of the works as the normal uncertainty attendant on any private person who depends on a decision to be taken by the public authority at its discretion.

95. Moreover, the economic risk that is a characteristic of the public works concessions covered by the Directive is clearly a direct consequence of the limited duration of concessions. A right of unlimited duration in the property to be constructed, on the contrary, would in principle always exclude the possibility of there being any economic risk because any difficulties that may occur in the exploitation of the property can always be remedied in the course of time.

96. Lastly, there is another argument for the generally limited duration of concessions within the ambit of Community law. It has already been observed several times in this Opinion that the fundamental objective of the Community rules on public contracts is, generally, to encourage competition to the greatest possible extent by abolishing all restrictions on fundamental freedoms. In that context, to admit the possibility of concessions of unlimited duration would be to preclude, to the detriment of competition and efficiency, the possibility of the works being exploited in the future by other persons employing more efficient methods based on more effective criteria.

97. These considerations have two consequences. On the one hand, concessions of unlimited duration cannot generally be granted. (35) On the other hand, a person cannot be granted a concession for property of which that person is already the owner, except where, under national law, the public authority acquires a right of ownership or a similar right in the property after a certain period of time.

98. In conclusion, I propose that the Court's answer to the seventh question should be that a public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18 can never provide for the concessionaire to have a right of unlimited duration in the property that is the object of the concession.

G – The eighth and ninth questions

99. The eighth and ninth questions can also be taken together, in view of their subject-matter. By the eighth question, the referring court seeks to ascertain whether the rules contained in Directive 2004/18 apply from the time when a public authority, although it has not yet formally decided to award a public contract, sells land with the intention of subsequently awarding a contract in that connection. The ninth question, on the other hand, concerns the possibility of regarding the sale of the land and the subsequent award of the contract as one and the same from a legal point of view.

100. Both questions, as we see, concern the possibility of dealing with a possible abuse of rights for the purpose of evading the Community provisions on public contracts, by applying those provisions in a way that does not take into account the typical chronological order considered in the Directive.

101. It should be noted that, in view of the answers I propose to give to the preceding questions, particularly the seventh question, it is probably unnecessary to provide the referring court with an answer to the eighth and ninth questions, since the possibility that a public works contract or a public works concession within the meaning of Community law is compatible with the presumed contractor/concessionaire having a right of ownership in the property concerned must be excluded.

However, for the sake of completeness and in the event of the Court not sharing my approach on the preceding questions, I shall offer some brief considerations on the matter.

102. Of the parties which submitted observations in the present case, only the Commission appeared to be willing to consider the approach favoured by the referring court. While noting that it is for the national courts to make the assessment in each specific case, the Commission admits that in a situation such as that at issue in the main proceedings Directive 2004/18 could in principle apply from the time when the authority decides to sell the land. All the other parties, albeit with various nuances, consider that the public authority's intention alone is irrelevant.

103. As the referring court points out, the answer to the eighth and ninth questions must undoubtedly take the Court's ruling in Mödling (36) into account. In that case, the Court was faced with a situation in which an Austrian municipality entrusted direct responsibility for the waste collection service to a company wholly controlled by the municipality and then proceeded, a few days later, to transfer 49% of the shares in that company to a private undertaking. The Court consequently held that where there is a clearly 'artificial construction', (37) the result of which is essentially to prejudice the effectiveness of the Directive on the award of contracts, the legal assessment of the case may be made 'taking into account all those stages as well as their purpose and not on the basis of their strictly chronological order'. (38)

104. In my view, the Court's ruling in Mödling is clearly based on two principal grounds. The first, explicitly stated, is the need to maintain the effectiveness of the Directive. (39) The second, implicit but basically the other side of the same coin, is the wish to deal with an abuse of rights.

105. The Court's ruling in Mödling certainly applies generally and it can therefore be stated that, in order to avoid an abuse of rights and ensure the effectiveness of the Community rules on public contracts, two formally and chronologically separate acts may be regarded as contemporaneous or as constituting a single legal act.

106. The assessment is naturally a matter for the national court, which alone has all the necessary elements of fact and of law at its disposal. However, for obvious reasons connected with the need to ensure legal certainty, a number of strict conditions must be met. In particular, there must be a reasonably short space of time between the sale of the land and the award of the contract, and there must be convincing evidence that the authority already intended to award the contract when the land was sold. Except in cases of major abuse where the intention to evade the rules is quite clear from the outset, only ex post facto assessment can take due account of all these elements.

107. I therefore propose that, if necessary, the answer to the eighth and ninth questions should be that, in cases where there is clear evidence of an intention to evade the Community provisions on public contracts and concessions, the legal assessment may regard the two formally and chronologically separate acts of a sale of land and the award of a contract or a concession in that connection as constituting a single legal act. It is for the national court to determine, on the basis of all the circumstances in the case, whether there was an intention to evade the rules.

V – Conclusion

108. I therefore propose that the Court give the following answers to the questions submitted by the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf:

In order for there to be a public works contract or a public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts, there must be a direct link between the public contracting authority and the work or works to be carried out. That direct link may consist, in particular, in the fact that the works are to be carried out for the public contracting authority or that they bring it an immediate economic benefit, or in the fact that the public contracting authority has taken the initiative for the execution of the works or bears at least some of the costs in that connection.

The concepts of a public works contract and a public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18 presuppose that the contractor is under a contractual obligation to the public authority to provide the agreed service. It is for national law to determine the consequences of any failure by the contractor to fulfil obligations.

A public works concession within the meaning of Directive 2004/18 can never provide for the concessionaire to have a right of unlimited duration in the property that is the object of the concession.

In cases where there is clear evidence of an intention to evade the Community provisions on public contracts and concessions, the legal assessment may regard the two formally and chronologically separate acts of a sale of land and the award of a contract or a concession in that connection as constituting a single legal act. It is for the national court to determine, on the basis of all the circumstances in the case, whether there was an intention to evade the rules.

2 – Clearly, a form of State aid may exist where public property is sold at a price below the market value. See, in this connection, the Commission communication on State aid elements in sales of land and buildings by public authorities (OJ 1997 C 209, p. 3).

3 – Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114).

7 – The German legislation was altered, after the order for reference was made, by the Law of 20 April 2009 modernising the Law on contracts (Gesetz zur Modernisierung des Vergaberechts, BGBl. I, p. 790), which amended Paragraph 99 of the GWB (the Law on protecting competition), specifying inter alia that, in the case referred to in the third variant of the definition of a public works contract, the contracting authority must obtain a direct economic benefit. See also footnote 35 below.

8 – However, it is not entirely clear which body awarded the concession. The Commission itself, although inclined to accept the referring court's position on this point, was obliged to recognise at the hearing that both the Bundesanstalt and the municipality of Wildeshausen exhibited some of the typical characteristics associated with that role but that it was impossible to recognise either as bearing the main responsibility in this connection.

9 – On the basis of the order for reference, there is no doubt that the specified thresholds for the application of the Directive are amply exceeded in the present case. In fact, since the value of the land does not in itself exceed the thresholds, clearly the national court's arguments are to some extent hypothetical. On the other hand, in the light of the settled case-law, according to which it is for the national court to determine whether the questions are relevant for the purpose of ruling on the dispute, I consider that in the present case the Court should reply to the questions referred by the Oberlandesgericht Düsseldorf. See in this connection, inter alia, Case C-415/93 Bosman [1995] ECR I-4921, paragraph 61; Case C-355/97 Beck and Bergdorf [1999] ECR I-4977, paragraph 22; Joined Cases C-222/05 to C-225/05 van der Weerd and Others [2007] ECR I-4233, paragraph 22; and Case C-500/06 Corporación Dermoestética [2008] ECR I-5785, paragraph 23.

10 – Case C-29/04 [2005] ECR I-9705.

11 – Not in all, however: for example, there is no equivalent for the second variant in the Portuguese version.

12 – German: ‘von Bauvorhaben’; French: ‘de travaux’; Spanish: ‘de obras’; Dutch: ‘van werken’; Portuguese: ‘de trabalhos’; Greek: ‘εργασιων’; Italian: ‘di lavori’.

13 – German: ‘eines Bauwerks’; French: ‘d’un ouvrage’; Spanish: ‘de una obra’; Dutch: ‘van een werk’; Greek: ‘ενός έργου’; Italian: ‘di un’opera’.

14 – German: ‘einer Bauleistung’; French: ‘d’un ouvrage’; Spanish: ‘de una obra’; Dutch: ‘van een werk’; Portuguese: ‘de uma obra’; Greek: ‘ενός έργου’; Italian: ‘di un’opera’.

15 – German: ‘Bauwerk’; French: ‘ouvrage’; Spanish: ‘obra’; Dutch: ‘werk’; Portuguese: ‘obra’; Greek: ‘έργο’; Italian: ‘opera’.

16 – I note however that, as the Austrian Government in particular pointed out at the hearing, the additional detail contained in the German text, although divergent, in fact simply makes it ‘more specific’ than the other language versions. In view of the structure of the provision in question, it is hardly possible, even with reference to the other language versions, to identify a case falling within the third variant in which the works are not carried out by a ‘third party’. In any event, it should be noted that it is settled case-law that the wording used in one language version of a Community provision cannot serve as the sole basis for the interpretation of that provision or be made to override the other language versions in that regard. See in this connection, inter alia, Case C-372/88 Cricket St Thomas [1990] ECR I-1345, paragraph 18, and Case C-455/05 Velvet & Steel Immobilien [2007] ECR I-3225, paragraph 19.

17 – That specific feature of the German version is based on Council Directive 89/440/EEC of 18 July 1989 amending Directive 71/305/EEC concerning coordination of the procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 210, p. 1). Directive 89/440 introduced the current ‘threefold’ definition of public works contracts into the Community legal order for the first time.

18 – See Auroux and Others, cited in footnote 6 above, paragraph 40.

19 – See Article 16 of the Directive.

20 – For example, in addition to paying a sum in cash, the public authority may exempt a person from payment of certain taxes (see Ordine degli Architetti and Others, cited in footnote 4 above, paragraphs 76 to 86).

22 – See, in particular, recital 2 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 and, earlier, the 2nd and 10th recitals in the preamble to Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54), now repealed. ---

32 – To be precise, in the formulation of the question, the referring court actually speaks of ownership of the land on which the works are to be carried out. However, as the court observes in the grounds for the reference, under German law, the right to use a building is a direct consequence of the right of ownership with respect to the land on which the building is erected. Thus, the real problem underlying this question is precisely the problem of the relationship between a concession and the right of ownership.

33 – On this ratio legis, see the Commission interpretative communication on concessions under Community law (OJ 2000 C 121, p. 2, paragraph 1.2) and the more recent communication from the Commission to the European Parliament, the Council, the European Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of the Regions on public-private partnerships and Community law on public procurement and concessions of 15 November 2005 (COM(2005) 569 final, paragraph 1).

34 – See Case C-458/03 Parking Brixen [2005] ECR I-8585, paragraph 40, and the judgment of 13 November 2008 in Case C-437/07 Commission v Italy, paragraphs 29 to 31. The risk need not necessarily be very great, as there are activities in which the risk is intrinsically limited: but it must represent all or at least a significant share of the risk to which the public authority would be exposed if it were to carry out the activities directly (Case C-206/08 Eurawasser [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 69 to 77).

35 – In my view, the new German law cited in footnote 7 above, which introduced inter alia a definition of public works concessions explicitly stating that the rights conferred on the concessionaire are of limited duration, is therefore correct and consistent with Community law.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Third Chamber)

28 January 2010 (*)

(Directive 89/665/EEC – Procedures for review of the award of public contracts – Period within which proceedings must be brought – Date from which the period for bringing proceedings starts to run)

In Case C-406/08,

REFERENCE for a preliminary ruling under Article 234 EC from the High Court of Justice (England and Wales), Queen's Bench Division (United Kingdom), made by decision of 30 July 2008, received at the Court on 18 September 2008, in the proceedings

NHS Business Services Authority,

THE COURT (Third Chamber),

composed of J.N. Cunha Rodrigues (Rapporteur), President of the Second Chamber, acting for the President of the Third Chamber, P. Lindh, A. Rosas, U. Lõhmus and A. Ó Caoimh, Judges,

Advocate General: J. Kokott,

Registrar: R. Şereş, Administrator,

having regard to the written procedure and further to the hearing on 24 September 2009, after considering the observations submitted on behalf of:

– Uniplex (UK) Ltd, by M. Sheridan, Barrister, and A. Stanic, Solicitor,

– NHS Business Services Authority, by R. Williams, Barrister,

– the United Kingdom Government, by I. Rao, acting as Agent, and K. Smith, Barrister,

– Ireland, by D. O'Hagan, acting as Agent, and A. Collins SC, – the Commission of the European Communities, by E. White and M. Konstantinidis, acting as Agents,

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 29 October 2009,

gives the following

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33), as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1)

('Directive 89/665'), with regard to the date from which the period for bringing proceedings starts to run in public procurement cases.

2 The reference has been made in the context of a dispute between Uniplex (UK) Ltd ('Uniplex') and NHS Business Services Authority ('NHS') concerning the conclusion of a framework agreement.

Legal context

Community legislation

3 Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 provides:

'The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of [Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682)], [Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1977 L 13, p. 1)], and [Directive] 92/50/EEC, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7), on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or national rules implementing that law.'

4 Under Article 2(1) of Directive 89/665:

'The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.'

5 Article 41(1) and (2) of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114) provides:

'1. Contracting authorities shall as soon as possible inform candidates and tenderers of decisions reached concerning the conclusion of a framework agreement, the award of the contract or admittance to a dynamic purchasing system, including the grounds for any decision not to conclude a framework agreement or award a contract for which there has been a call for competition or to recommence the procedure or implement a dynamic purchasing system; that information shall be given in writing upon request to the contracting authorities.

2. On request from the party concerned, the contracting authority shall as quickly as possible inform:

– any unsuccessful candidate of the reasons for the rejection of his application,

– any unsuccessful tenderer of the reasons for the rejection of his tender, including, for the cases referred to in Article 23, paragraphs 4 and 5, the reasons for its decision of non-equivalence or its decision that the works, supplies or services do not meet the performance or functional requirements,

– any tenderer who has made an admissible tender of the characteristics and relative advantages of the tender selected as well as the name of the successful tenderer or the parties to the framework agreement.

The time taken may in no circumstances exceed 15 days from receipt of the written request.'

National legislation

6 Regulation 47(7)(b) of the Public Contracts Regulations 2006 ('the 2006 Regulations'), adopted in order to implement Directive 89/665 into domestic law, provides:

'Proceedings under this regulation must not be brought unless –

(b) those proceedings are brought promptly and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the bringing of the proceedings first arose unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending the period within which proceedings may be brought.'

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

7 Uniplex, a company established in the United Kingdom, is the sole distributor in that Member State of haemostats manufactured by Gelita Medical BV, a company established in the Netherlands.

8 NHS is part of the National Health Service, the State-owned and -operated public health service in the United Kingdom. It is a contracting authority for the purposes of Directive 2004/18.

9 On 26 March 2007 NHS launched a restricted tendering procedure for the conclusion of a framework agreement for the supply of haemostats. A notice to that effect was published in the Official Journal of the European Union on 28 March 2007.

10 On 13 June 2007, NHS issued an invitation to tender to five suppliers, including Uniplex, which had expressed interest in that framework agreement. Tenders were to be submitted by 19 July 2007.

11 The award criteria, with the relevant weighting to be given to each, set out in the tendering documentation sent to the tenderers, were as follows: price and other cost effectiveness factors (30%); quality and clinical acceptability (30%); product support and training (20%); delivery performance and capability (10%); product range/development (5%); and environmental/sustainability (5%).

12 Uniplex submitted its tender on 18 July 2007.

13 On 22 November 2007, NHS sent to Uniplex a letter indicating that it had decided to conclude a framework agreement with three tenderers. Uniplex was notified that it would not be awarded a framework agreement, as it had obtained the lowest marks of the five tenderers which had been invited to submit, and which had submitted, bids. That letter set out the award criteria, with the corresponding weighting, and indicated the names of the successful tenderers, the range of the successful scores and Uniplex's evaluated score.

14 According to that letter, the range of the successful scores was between 905.5 and 971.5, whereas Uniplex had obtained a score of 568.

15 The letter of 22 November 2007 also informed Uniplex of its right to challenge the decision to conclude the framework agreement in question, of the mandatory 10-day standstill period that would apply from the date of notification of that decision to conclusion of the framework agreement, and of Uniplex's entitlement to seek an additional debriefing.

17 NHS replied on 13 December 2007 by providing details of its approach to the evaluation of the award criteria as to characteristics and relative advantages of the successful tenders in relation to Uniplex's tender.

18 That letter stated, inter alia, first, that Uniplex had been given a score of zero for price and other cost effectiveness factors because it had submitted its list prices. All the other tenderers had offered discounts on their list prices. Secondly, with respect to the delivery performance and capability criterion, all tenderers which were new to the haemostats market in the United Kingdom received a score of zero for the sub-criterion relating to customer base in the United Kingdom.

19 On 28 January 2008, Uniplex sent NHS a letter before action alleging a number of breaches of the 2006 Regulations. Uniplex claimed in that letter that time did not start to run for the bringing of proceedings until 13 December 2007. Uniplex requested a reply from NHS by 13 February 2008, but added that if NHS took the view that time did not run from that date, it should reply by 6 February 2008.

20 By letter dated 11 February 2008, NHS notified Uniplex that there had been a change of circumstances. It had been discovered that the bid of Assut (UK) Ltd was non-compliant and that B. Braun UK Ltd, which had been placed fourth under the evaluation of tenders, had been awarded a position on the framework agreement in place of Assut (UK) Ltd.

21 NHS responded to Uniplex's letter before action by letter dated 13 February 2008, denying the various allegations made by Uniplex. In that letter, NHS also asserted, as a preliminary point, that the events giving rise to Uniplex's complaints had occurred no later than 22 November 2007, which was the date on which the decision not to include Uniplex in the framework agreement had been communicated to it. NHS asserted that 22 November 2007 was the latest date from which time began to run for the purposes of Regulation 47(7)(b) of the 2006 Regulations.

22 Uniplex responded by letter on 26 February 2008. In that letter, it continued to maintain that the period for bringing proceedings under the 2006 Regulations did not begin to run until 13 December 2007.

23 On 12 March 2008, Uniplex brought proceedings before the High Court of Justice (England and Wales), Queen's Bench Division, inter alia seeking, first, a declaration that NHS had breached the applicable public procurement rules and, second, damages.

24 The High Court of Justice (England and Wales), Queen's Bench Division, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'Where an economic operator is challenging in national proceedings the award of a framework agreement by a contracting authority following a public procurement exercise in which he was a tenderer and which was required to be conducted in accordance with Directive 2004/18/EC (and applicable implementing national provisions), and is in those proceedings seeking declarations and damages for breach of applicable public procurement provisions as regards that exercise and award:

(a) is a national provision such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the Public Contracts Regulations 2006 which states that those proceedings are to be brought promptly and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the bringing of the proceedings first arose, unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending the period, to be interpreted, in light of Directive 89/665/EEC, Articles 1 and 2, and the Community-law principle of equivalence and the Community-law requirement for effective legal protection, and/or the principle of effectiveness, and having regard to any other relevant principles of EC law, as conferring an individual and unconditional right upon the tenderer against the contracting authority such that the time for the bringing of proceedings challenging such a tender exercise and award starts running as from the date when the tenderer knew or ought to have known that the procurement procedure and award infringed EC public procurement law or as from the date of breach of the applicable public procurement provisions; and

(b) in either event how is a national court then to apply (i) any requirement for proceedings to be brought promptly and (ii) any discretion as to extending the national limitation period for the bringing of such proceedings?’

The questions referred

The first question

25 By its first question, the national court asks, in essence, whether Article 1 of Directive 89/665 requires that the period for bringing proceedings seeking to have an infringement of the public procurement rules established or to obtain damages for the infringement of those rules starts to run from the date of the infringement of those rules or from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of that infringement.

26 The objective of Directive 89/665 is to guarantee the existence of effective remedies for infringements of Community law in the field of public procurement or of the national rules implementing that law, so as to ensure the effective application of the directives on the coordination of public procurement procedures. However, Directive 89/665 contains no provision specifically covering time-limits for the applications for review which it seeks to establish. It is therefore for the internal legal order of each Member State to establish such time-limits (Case C-470/99 Universale-Bau and Others [2002] ECR I-11617, paragraph 71).

27 The detailed procedural rules governing the remedies intended to protect rights conferred by Community law on candidates and tenderers harmed by decisions of contracting authorities must not compromise the effectiveness of Directive 89/665 (Universale-Bau and Others, paragraph 72).

28 It is for that reason appropriate to determine whether, in the light of the purpose of Directive 89/665, national legislation such as that at issue in the main proceedings does not adversely affect rights conferred on individuals by Community law (Universale-Bau and Others, paragraph 73).

29 In that regard, it should be recalled that Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires Member States to guarantee that unlawful decisions of contracting authorities can be subjected to effective review which is as swift as possible (Universale-Bau and Others, paragraph 74).

30 However, the fact that a candidate or tenderer learns that its application or tender has been rejected does not place it in a position effectively to bring proceedings. Such information is insufficient to enable the candidate or tenderer to establish whether there has been any illegality which might form the subject-matter of proceedings.

31 It is only once a concerned candidate or tenderer has been informed of the reasons for its elimination from the public procurement procedure that it may come to an informed view as to whether there has been an infringement of the applicable provisions and as to the appropriateness of bringing proceedings.

32 It follows that the objective laid down in Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 of guaranteeing effective procedures for review of infringements of the provisions applicable in the field of public procurement can be realised only if the periods laid down for bringing such proceedings start to run only from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of the alleged infringement of those provisions (see, to that effect, Universale-Bau and Others, paragraph 78).

33 This conclusion is supported by the fact that Article 41(1) and (2) of Directive 2004/18, which was in force at the time of the facts in the main proceedings, requires contracting authorities to notify unsuccessful candidates and tenderers of the reasons for the decision concerning them. Such provisions are consistent with a system of limitation periods under which those periods start to run from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of the alleged infringement of the provisions applicable in the field of public procurement.

34 The same conclusion is also supported by the amendments made to Directive 89/665 by Directive 2007/66/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 December 2007 amending Council Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC with regard to improving the effectiveness of review procedures concerning the award of public contracts (OJ 2007 L 335, p. 31), even though the period for transposition of that directive did not expire until after the facts in the main proceedings had occurred. Article 2c of Directive 89/665, introduced by Directive 2007/66, provides that the decision of the contracting authority is to be communicated to each candidate or tenderer, accompanied by a summary of the relevant reasons, and that the period for making an application for review expires only after a specified number of days following that communication.

35 The answer to the first question accordingly is that Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires that the period for bringing proceedings seeking to have an infringement of the public procurement rules established or to obtain damages for the infringement of those rules should start to run from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of that infringement.

The second question

36 The second question consists of two parts. The first concerns the interpretation of Directive 89/665 in relation to a requirement under national law that proceedings be brought promptly. The second relates to the effects which that directive has on the discretion conferred on the national court to extend periods within which proceedings must be brought.

The first part of the second question

37 By the first part of the second question, the national court asks, in essence, whether Directive 89/665 is to be interpreted as precluding a provision, such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the 2006 Regulations, which requires that proceedings be brought promptly.

38 As observed in paragraph 29 of this judgment, Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires Member States to guarantee that decisions of contracting authorities can be subjected to effective review which is as swift as possible. In order to attain the objective of rapidity pursued by that directive, Member States may impose limitation periods for actions in order to require traders to challenge promptly preliminary measures or interim decisions taken in public procurement procedures (see, to that effect, Universale-Bau and Others, paragraphs 75 to 79; Case C-230/02 Grossmann Air Service [2004] ECR I-1829, paragraphs 30 and 36 to 39; and Case C-241/06 Lämmerzahl [2007] ECR I-8415, paragraphs 50 and 51).

39 The objective of rapidity pursued by Directive 89/665 must be achieved in national law in compliance with the requirements of legal certainty. To that end, Member States have an obligation to establish a system of limitation periods that is sufficiently precise, clear and foreseeable to enable individuals to ascertain their rights and obligations (see, to that effect, Case C-361/88 Commission v Germany [1991] ECR I-2567, paragraph 24, and Case C-221/94 Commission v Luxembourg [1996] ECR I-5669, paragraph 22).

40 Furthermore, the objective of rapidity pursued by Directive 89/665 does not permit Member States to disregard the principle of effectiveness, under which the detailed methods for the application of national limitation periods must not render impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of any rights which the person concerned derives from Community law, a principle which underlies the objective of effective review proceedings laid down in Article 1(1) of that directive.

41 A national provision such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the 2006 Regulations, under which proceedings must not be brought ‘unless … those proceedings are brought promptly and in any event within three months’, gives rise to uncertainty. The possibility cannot be ruled out that such a provision empowers national courts to dismiss an action as being out of time even before the expiry of the three-month period if those courts take the view that the application was not made ‘promptly’ within the terms of that provision.

42 As the Advocate General observed in point 69 of her Opinion, a limitation period, the duration of which is placed at the discretion of the competent court, is not predictable in its effects. Consequently, a national provision providing for such a period does not ensure effective transposition of Directive 89/665.

43 It follows that the answer to the first part of the second question is that Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 precludes a national provision, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which allows a national court to dismiss, as being out of time, proceedings seeking to have an infringement of the public procurement rules established or to obtain damages for the infringement of those rules on the basis of the criterion, appraised in a discretionary manner, that such proceedings must be brought promptly.

The second part of the second question

44 By the second part of the second question, the national court asks, in essence, which effects follow from Directive 89/665 in respect of the discretion conferred on the national court to extend periods within which proceedings must be brought.

45 In the case of national provisions transposing a directive, national courts are bound to interpret national law, so far as possible, in the light of the wording and purpose of the directive concerned in order to achieve the result sought by that directive (see Case 14/83 Von Colson and Kamann [1984] ECR 1891, paragraph 26, and Joined Cases C-397/01 to C-403/01 Pfeiffer and Others [2004] ECR I-8835, paragraph 113).

46 In the present case, it is for the national court, as far as is at all possible, to interpret the domestic provisions establishing the limitation period in a manner which accords with the objective of Directive 89/665 (see, to that effect, Case C-327/00 Santex [2003] ECR I-1877, paragraph 63, and Lämmerzahl, paragraph 62).

47 In order to satisfy the requirements in the answer given to the first question, the national court dealing with the case must, as far as is at all possible, interpret the national provisions governing the limitation period in such a way as to ensure that that period begins to run only from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of the infringement of the rules applicable to the public procurement procedure in question.

48 If the national provisions at issue do not lend themselves to such an interpretation, that court is bound, in exercise of the discretion conferred on it, to extend the period for bringing proceedings in such a manner as to ensure that the claimant has a period equivalent to that which it would have had if the period provided for by the applicable national legislation had run from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of the infringement of the public procurement rules.

49 In any event, if the national provisions do not lend themselves to an interpretation which accords with Directive 89/665, the national court must refrain from applying those provisions, in order to apply Community law fully and to protect the rights conferred thereby on individuals (see, to that effect, Santex, paragraph 64, and Lämmerzahl, paragraph 63).

50 The answer to the second part of the second question is accordingly that Directive 89/665 requires the national court, by virtue of the discretion conferred on it, to extend the limitation period in such a manner as to ensure that the claimant has a period equivalent to that which it would have had if the period provided for by the applicable national legislation had run from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of the infringement of the public procurement rules. If the national provisions do not lend themselves to an interpretation which accords with Directive 89/665, the national court must refrain from applying them, in order to apply Community law fully and to protect the rights conferred thereby on individuals.

Costs

51 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Article 1(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts, as amended by Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992, requires that the period for bringing proceedings seeking to have an infringement of the public procurement rules established or to obtain damages for the infringement of those rules should start to run from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of that infringement.

2. Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50, precludes a national provision, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which allows a national court to dismiss, as being out of time, proceedings seeking to have an infringement of the public procurement rules established or to obtain damages for the infringement of those rules on the basis of the criterion, appraised in a discretionary manner, that such proceedings must be brought promptly.

3. Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50, requires the national court, by virtue of the discretion conferred on it, to extend the limitation period in such a manner as to ensure that the claimant has a period equivalent to that which it would have had if the period provided for by the applicable national legislation had run from the date on which the claimant knew, or ought to have known, of the infringement of the public procurement rules. If the national provisions do not lend themselves to an interpretation which accords with Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 92/50, the national court must refrain from applying them, in order to apply Community law fully and to protect the rights conferred thereby on individuals.

OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL
delivered on 29 October 2009 1

Case C-406/08

Uniplex (UK) Ltd
NHS Business Services Authority

(Reference for a preliminary ruling from the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division, Leeds District Registry (United Kingdom))

(Public procurement – Directive 89/665/EEC – Review procedure under national law – Effective legal protection – Limitation periods – Point at which time starts running – Whether the applicant knew or 'ought to have' known of the breach of procurement law – Requirement that proceedings be brought 'promptly')

I – Introduction

1. This reference for a preliminary ruling from the High Court of Justice of England and Wales (2) gives the Court of Justice of the European Communities an opportunity to develop its case-law on the remedies available to unsuccessful tenderers in public procurement procedures.

2. It is acknowledged that the Member States may lay down appropriate limitation periods for remedies of this kind. Clarification is required, however, in particular on the question of the time from which those limitation periods may start to run: the time at which the alleged breach of procurement law occurred, or the time at which the unsuccessful tenderer knew or should have known of the breach. This problem, whose practical effects should not be underestimated, arises in the context of a provision of English law under which the period for bringing applications for review starts to run regardless of the unsuccessful tenderer's knowledge of the breach of procurement law, and any extension of the period is at the discretion of the national court.

3. As regards the legal issues raised, the present case has certain points of contact with Case C-456/08 Commission v Ireland, in which I also deliver my Opinion today.

II – Legal context

A – Community law

4. The Community law context of the present case is defined by Directive 89/665/EEC, (3) as amended by Directive 92/50/EEC. (4) (5)

5. Article 1 of Directive 89/665 provides as follows:

‘1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of Directives 71/305/EEC, 77/62/EEC, and 92/50/EEC … decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or nation[al] rules implementing that law.

2. Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings claiming injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.’ (6)

6. In addition, Article 2(1) of Directive 89/665 contains the following provision:

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting-aside of decisions taken unlawfully …

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.’

B – National law

7. For England, Wales and Northern Ireland, Directive 89/665 was transposed by Part 9 of the Public Contracts Regulations 2006 (‘the PCR 2006’), (7) Regulation 47 of which provides, in extract, as follows:

‘(1) The obligation on –

(a) a contracting authority to comply with the provisions of these Regulations, other than regulations …, and with any enforceable Community obligation in respect of a public contract, framework agreement or design contest …

is a duty owed to an economic operator.

(6) A breach of the duty owed in accordance with paragraph (1) or (2) is actionable by any economic operator which, in consequence, suffers, or risks suffering, loss or damage and those proceedings shall be brought in the High Court.

(7) Proceedings under this regulation must not be brought unless –

(a) the economic operator bringing the proceedings has informed the contracting authority or concessionaire, as the case may be, of the breach or apprehended breach of the duty owed to it in accordance with paragraph (1) or (2) by that contracting authority or concessionaire and of its intention to bring proceedings under this regulation in respect of it; and

(b) those proceedings are brought promptly and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the bringing of the proceedings first arose unless the Court considers that there is good reason for extending the period within which proceedings may be brought.

(9) In proceedings under this regulation the Court does not have power to order any remedy other than an award of damages in respect of a breach of the duty owed in accordance with paragraph (1) or (2) if the contract in relation to which the breach occurred has been entered into.'

III – Facts and main proceedings

8. Uniplex (UK) Ltd (8) is a company established in the United Kingdom and an economic operator for the purposes of Directive 2004/18 and the PCR 2006. It is the sole distributor in the United Kingdom of haemostats manufactured by the Netherlands company Gelita Medical BV.

9. NHS Business Services Authority (9) is part of the public health service of the United Kingdom, the National Health Service, which is owned and operated by the State. It is a contracting authority for the purposes of Directive 2004/18 and the PCR 2006.

10. On 26 March 2007 NHS Business Services invited tenders, in a restricted procedure, for a framework agreement for the supply of haemostats to National Health Service institutions. (10) A notice to that effect was published in the Official Journal of the European Union on 28 March 2007.

11. By letter of 13 June 2007, NHS Business Services addressed an invitation to tender to five interested parties, including Uniplex. The deadline for the submission of tenders was 19 July 2007. Uniplex submitted its tender on 18 July 2007.

12. On 22 November 2007 Uniplex was informed by NHS Business Services in writing that awards had finally been made to three tenderers, but that Uniplex would not be awarded a framework agreement. The letter also set out the award criteria, the names of the successful tenderers, the evaluated score of Uniplex, and the range of the evaluated scores achieved by the successful tenderers. According to the criteria applied by NHS Business Services, Uniplex had achieved the lowest evaluated score of the five tenderers which had been invited to submit and had submitted bids. In the letter Uniplex was also informed of its right to challenge the award decision and to seek further information.

13. In reply to a separate request by Uniplex of 23 November 2007, NHS Business Services on 13 December 2007 gave details of its method of evaluation with reference to its award criteria, and also of the characteristics and relative advantages of the bids of the successful tenderers compared with the Uniplex tender.

14. On 28 January 2008 Uniplex sent NHS Business Services a letter before action alleging various breaches of the public procurement rules.

15. By letter of 11 February 2008, NHS Business Services informed Uniplex that the situation had changed. It had been found that the tender by Assut (UK) Ltd did not comply with the requirements, and B. Braun (UK) Ltd, which had been placed fourth in the evaluation of the tenders, had been included in the framework agreement instead of Assut (UK) Ltd.

16. After a further exchange of correspondence between Uniplex and NHS Business Services, in which inter alia the starting point of the period for bringing proceedings was disputed, Uniplex on 12 March 2008 commenced proceedings in the High Court, the court making the present reference. It seeks inter alia a declaration of the alleged breaches of procurement law, damages from NHS Business Services in respect of those breaches, and – if the court has jurisdiction to make such an order – an order that NHS Business Services award Uniplex a framework agreement.

17. The referring court is uncertain whether Uniplex brought its action in time and, if not, whether it should exercise its discretion to extend the period for bringing proceedings under Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006.

IV – Order for reference and procedure before the Court

18. By order of 30 July 2008, received at the Court on 18 September 2008, the High Court stayed the proceedings before it and referred the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

Where an economic operator is challenging in national proceedings the award of a framework agreement by a contracting authority following a public procurement exercise in which he was a tenderer and which was required to be conducted in accordance with Directive 2004/18 (and applicable implementing national provisions), and is in those proceedings seeking declarations and damages for breach of applicable public procurement provisions as regards that exercise and award:

(a) is a national provision such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 which states that those proceedings are to be brought promptly and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the bringing of the proceedings first arose, unless the court considers that there is good reason for extending the period, to be interpreted, in light of Articles 1 and 2 of Directive 89/665 and the Community law principle of equivalence and the Community law requirement for effective legal protection, and/or the principle of effectiveness, and having regard to any other relevant principles of EC law, as conferring an individual and unconditional right upon the tenderer against the contracting authority such that the time for the bringing of proceedings challenging such a tender exercise and award starts running as from the date when the tenderer knew or ought to have known that the procurement procedure and award infringed EC public procurement law or as from the date of breach of the applicable public procurement provisions; and

(b) in either event how is a national court then to apply

(i) any requirement for proceedings to be brought promptly and

(ii) any discretion as to extending the national limitation period for the bringing of such proceedings?

19. In the procedure before the Court, in addition to Uniplex and NHS Business Services, the United Kingdom Government, Ireland and the Commission of the European Communities made written and oral observations. (11) The German Government also took part in the hearing.

V – Assessment

20. By its two questions, the High Court seeks essentially to know what requirements derive from Community law for the interpretation and application of limitation periods in the public procurement review procedure.

21. Directive 89/665 makes no express provision on the time-limits that apply to review procedures under Article 1 of the directive. (12) However, the Court has consistently held that the Member States may in the exercise of their procedural autonomy introduce reasonable limitation periods for bringing proceedings, provided that they comply with the principles of equivalence and effectiveness. (13) Those two principles are also reflected in Article 1 of Directive 89/665, the principle of equivalence in Article 1(2) and the principle of effectiveness in Article 1(1). (14)

22. In the present case it is the principle of effectiveness that is the focus of interest. That the United Kingdom can lay down limitation periods for applications for the review of decisions of contracting authorities is not in dispute. (15) The dispute between the parties concerns merely certain details of the interpretation and application of the national rules on limitation. They disagree on whether a limitation provision such as that in Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 has due regard to the requirements of Community law. In this connection the referring court wishes to know – whether it may take as the point when time starts running the date of the breach of procurement law, or must take the date when the applicant knew or ought to have known of the breach (first question), – whether in a review procedure it may dismiss an action as inadmissible if it has not been brought ‘promptly’ (first part of the second question), and – how it should exercise its discretion with respect to a possible extension of time (second part of the second question).

23. It depends on the answers to those questions whether or not the referring court must regard the application brought by Uniplex in the main proceedings as brought in time within the meaning of Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006.

24. I shall start by addressing the first question (see Section A below) and the second part of the second question (see Section B below), which are closely connected, before turning to the first part of the second question (see Section C below).

25. Contrary to the oral submissions of NHS Business Services, the United Kingdom and Ireland, it cannot be decisive for the answer to those questions that a provision such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 may reflect a long tradition in the Member State concerned.

26. Certainly, when requirements of Community law are being interpreted, attention should indeed always be paid to whether they can be fitted into national law with as little friction as possible. For all that, the Court's primary function is to ensure that in the interpretation and application of European Community law the law is observed (first paragraph of Article 220 EC) and – working together with the national courts – to give effect to the rights that individuals derive from Community law.

A – Relevance of knowledge of the breach of procurement law for determining when time starts running (first question)

27. By its first question, the referring court seeks essentially to know whether it may take as the point when the limitation period starts running in review procedures under procurement law the date of the breach of procurement law, or must take the date when the applicant knew or ought to have known of the breach.

28. The opinions of the parties differ on this point. Uniplex, the German Government and the Commission take the view that, at least with reference to legal remedies that do not affect the validity of contracts, no limitation period may start before the applicant knew or ought to have known of the alleged breach of procurement law. By contrast, NHS Business Services, the United Kingdom Government and Ireland insist that the running of time cannot depend on whether the applicant knew or ought to have known of a breach of procurement law; it suffices to give the national courts a discretion to extend the limitation period.

29. The latter view is reflected in the practice of both the English courts (16) and the Irish courts. (17) According to that case-law, the period for review of a procurement decision starts to run, in accordance with Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006, (18) regardless of whether the tenderer or candidate concerned knew or ought to have known of the breach of procurement law complained of. The applicant's lack of knowledge of the breach of procurement law may at most be relevant to extending the period, and in that respect is one of a number of aspects which the national court takes into account when exercising its discretion. (19)

30. Against the background of this dominant practice of the English courts, (20) it will be discussed below whether it is compatible with the requirements of Community law for a limitation period such as that in Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 to start running regardless of whether the applicant knew or ought to have known of the breach of procurement law in question.

31. Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires it to be possible for decisions taken by contracting authorities to be reviewed for infringements of procurement law 'effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible'. That is an expression both of the principle of effectiveness ('effectively') and of the requirement of rapid action ('as rapidly as possible'). Neither of those concerns may be put into practice at the expense of the other. (21) A fair balance between them must instead be struck, and this is to be assessed in the light of the type and consequences of the particular legal remedy and the rights and interests of all parties concerned.

32. In my Opinion in pressetext Nachrichtenagentur I have previously suggested a solution based on a differentiation between primary and secondary legal protection. (22)

– The difference between primary and secondary legal protection

33. If a remedy is aimed at having a contract already concluded with a successful tenderer declared void (primary legal protection), it is reasonable to lay down an absolute limitation period of comparatively short duration. The particularly severe legal consequence of the invalidity of an already concluded contract is justification for laying down a period that also runs regardless of whether the applicant knew, or at least ought to have known, that the award of the contract was contrary to procurement law. Both for the contracting authority and for its contractual partner, there is a clear need, deserving of protection, for legal certainty with respect to the validity of the contract that has been concluded. (23) The requirement of review 'as rapidly as possible' within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 therefore carries particular weight in the field of primary legal protection.

34. It is otherwise if a remedy is directed merely at a declaration of an infringement of procurement law and possibly an award of compensation (secondary legal protection). Such a remedy does not affect the existence of a contract already concluded with a successful tenderer. The contractual partners' need for certainty of planning and their interest in performing the public contract swiftly are not affected. Accordingly, there is no occasion to subject applications for secondary legal protection to the same strict limitation periods as applications for primary legal protection. On the contrary, the aim of effective review which Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 imposes on the Member States argues in favour of giving more weight to the legal protection interests of the unsuccessful tenderer or candidate, and hence in favour of more generous limitation periods which do not start running until the person concerned knows or ought to know of the alleged breach of procurement law. (24)

35. Contrary to the view taken by NHS Business Services and the United Kingdom Government, such a differentiation between primary and secondary legal protection does not lead to 'lack of transparency' and 'legal uncertainty'. Nor is it suitable only for cases such as pressetext Nachrichtenagentur in which a contracting authority makes a 'direct award' with no prior notice of the award.

36. The distinction between primary and secondary legal protection is, rather, of general validity. It makes it possible to strike a fair balance between 'effective review' and 'review as rapidly as possible', and is sketched out in Directive 89/665 itself. Even in the original version of the directive, a distinction is drawn in Article 2(1)(b) and (c) between the setting-aside of unlawful decisions on the one hand and the awarding of compensation on the other. In future, Articles 2d, 2e and 2f of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 2007/66, will show more plainly this distinction between primary and secondary legal protection, also and particularly with respect to limitation periods. (25)

37. The present case concerns not primary but only secondary legal protection. That becomes especially clear if one looks at the introductory words to the questions formulated by the High Court. That passage speaks exclusively of applications for a declaration of a breach of procurement law and for the award of compensation. That is the context of the questions referred. (26)

38. There is therefore no reason to subject the applications brought by Uniplex in the main proceedings to the same strict limitation periods that might perhaps apply to applications for a declaration of the invalidity of a contract or indeed for a contracting authority to be ordered to enter into a contract.

– Time running from when the applicant knew or 'ought to have' known of the breach of procurement law

39. The principle of effectiveness, as expressed in Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, requires that a limitation period for claims for compensation and applications for declarations of breaches of procurement law may not start to run until the time when the applicant knew or ought to have known of the alleged breach of procurement law. (27)

40. The Court has also expressed this in Universale-Bau and Others: (28) it considers that the spirit and purpose of rules on limitation are to ensure that unlawful decisions of contracting authorities, from the moment they become known to those concerned, (29) are challenged and corrected as soon as possible. (30)

41. It is of course for the referring court to ascertain the time from which the person concerned knew or ought to have known of a breach of procurement law. (31) In order to give a useful answer, however, the Court may, in a spirit of cooperation with national courts, provide all the guidance that it regards as necessary. (32)

42. The mere fact that a tenderer or candidate has learnt that his tender has been unsuccessful does not yet mean that he knows of any breach of procurement law. Consequently, that fact on its own cannot yet set any limitation periods running for applications for secondary legal protection. As Uniplex correctly submits, an unsuccessful tenderer or candidate for his part could also not rely, in an application for review, on the mere statement that his tender had not been accepted.

43. Only once the unsuccessful tenderer or candidate has been informed of the essential reasons for his being unsuccessful in the award procedure may it generally be presumed that he knew or in any case ought to have known of the alleged breach of procurement law. (33) Only from then on is it possible for him sensibly to prepare a possible application for review and to estimate its chances of success. (34) Before receiving such reasons, on the other hand, the person concerned cannot as a rule effectively exercise his right to a review. (35)

44. Directive 2004/18 accordingly lays down already today, in Article 41(1) and (2), that contracting authorities must inform unsuccessful tenderers and candidates of the reasons for their rejection. To the same effect, Article 2c of Directive 89/665, inserted by Directive 2007/66, provides for future cases that the communication of the contracting authority's decision to each tenderer or candidate must be accompanied by a summary of the relevant reasons, and that any limitation periods for applications for review may not expire until a certain number of calendar days after that communication.

45. Merely for the sake of completeness, it may be mentioned that the time when the period starts running for bringing a claim for compensation must not be made to depend on the fact that the applicant knew or ought to have known of the damage incurred by him. (36) The damage that follows from a breach of duty sometimes comes to light only after some delay. Waiting for knowledge of the damage would thus run counter to the principle of review 'as rapidly as possible' within the meaning of Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665. In return, however, it must be made possible for the tenderer or candidate concerned, if necessary, first to make an application for a declaration of a breach of procurement law and then to quantify the damage and claim compensation in subsequent proceedings.

– The national court's discretion to grant an extension of the limitation period

46. NHS Business Services, the United Kingdom and Ireland object that effective legal protection does not necessarily require, however, that the limitation periods for seeking remedies in review proceedings run only from the time when the tenderer or candidate concerned knew or ought to have known of the alleged infringement of procurement law. They submit that a provision such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 ensures effective legal protection by giving the national court a discretion to extend, if appropriate, the period for bringing proceedings.

47. That argument does not convince me.

48. Article 1(1) in conjunction with Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665 gives any person who has or had an interest in obtaining a particular public contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement an individual right to review of the decisions of the contracting authority. (37) As I explain in the parallel case of Commission v Ireland, the effective assertion of such a claim cannot be made to depend on the discretion of a national body, not even the discretion of an independent court. (38)

49. Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 does not give the national court any legal criteria for the exercise of its discretion as regards a possible extension of time. At the hearing before the Court, all the parties moreover agreed in submitting that the applicant's lack of knowledge of a breach of procurement law is only one of several aspects which influence the national court's assessment. Thus lack of knowledge may lead to an extension of the period, but this is not mandatory. Furthermore, the national court may, as Ireland observes, limit an extension of time to specific complaints and refuse it for others, so that an action by the unsuccessful tenderer or candidate may well be only partially admissible.

50. It thus becomes unpredictable for the person concerned in the individual case whether it will be worth his while to claim a legal remedy. Such a legal position may deter unsuccessful tenderers or candidates – especially those from other Member States – from asserting their legal right to review of the decisions of contracting authorities. The objective of effective review, as prescribed by Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665, cannot be achieved with certainty in those circumstances.

– Practical problems in determining whether an applicant 'knows' or 'ought to know'

51. NHS Business Services and the United Kingdom further assert that it will lead to considerable practical problems if a limitation period does not start running until the date on which the unsuccessful tenderer or candidate knew or ought to have known of the alleged breach of procurement law. It is not easy, for example, to assess what the knowledge must relate to in the particular case or at what time it was acquired or from when it must be presumed.

52. It suffices to point out here that the same practical problems also arise if a court, when exercising its discretion as to a possible extension of time, has to consider the time from which the applicant knew or ought to have known of the breach of procurement law he complains of. A provision such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 cannot avoid such practical problems; it merely treats them from a different point of view.

– The deterrent effect of actions for compensation

53. Ireland also objects that an overgenerous approach to time-limits for bringing actions for compensation may have a highly deterrent effect on contracting authorities (a 'chilling effect') and cause considerable delay to award procedures. This submission was adopted at the hearing by NHS Business Services and the United Kingdom.

54. This argument is also unconvincing, however.

55. Successful actions for compensation by unsuccessful tenderers or candidates may undoubtedly entail a substantial financial burden for the contracting authority. This risk is, however, the price to be paid by a contracting authority so that effective legal protection in connection with the award of public contracts can be provided. Any attempt to minimise the attendant financial risks for the contracting authority will necessarily be at the expense of effective legal protection.

56. A too restrictive approach to the conditions for obtaining secondary legal protection would ultimately also jeopardise the achievement of the objectives of the review procedure. Those objectives do not only include the provision of legal protection for the tenderers and candidates concerned. The review procedure is in fact also intended to have a disciplinary effect on contracting authorities, by ensuring that the rules of European procurement law – in particular the requirement of transparency and the prohibition of discrimination – are observed and any infringements penalised.

57. Merely in passing, it may be observed that not even a limitation rule such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 is capable of excluding the chilling effect mentioned. As already noted, that provision leaves it in the discretion of the national court to extend the limitation periods for unsuccessful tenderers or candidates, especially where they had no previous knowledge of the alleged infringement of procurement law. This possibility of an extension of time may thus lead to the contracting authority, long after the contract has been concluded with the successful tenderer or candidate, still being exposed to the risk of claims for compensation. Because of the unpredictability of the exercise of judicial discretion, this risk is if anything more difficult for the contracting authority to calculate in the context of Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 than with a rule under which the limitation period starts to run as soon as the person concerned knows or ought to know of the alleged breach of procurement law.

B – The national court's discretion to grant an extension of time (second part of the second question)

58. The second part of the second question is closely connected with the first question. The referring court essentially wishes to know what steps it should take if an unsuccessful tenderer or candidate did not initially know of the alleged breach of procurement law, and was not in a position in which he ought to have known of it, so that he could not make an application for review within the three-month period under Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006.

59. According to settled case-law, the courts of the Member States are required to interpret and apply national law consistently with directives. (39) Specifically with respect to procurement review procedures, they must interpret the national provisions laying down a limitation period, as far as is at all possible, in such a way as to ensure observance of the principle of effectiveness deriving from Directive 89/665. (40)

60. As I have explained in connection with the first question, (41) limitation periods for actions for declarations and compensation in connection with public contracts may not start to run until the time when the applicant knew or ought to have known of the alleged breach of procurement law. The referring court must therefore do whatever lies within its jurisdiction to achieve that objective. (42)

61. Consequently, the referring court is required above all to deal with the limitation period under Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006, in harmony with the directive, in such a way that in the case of proceedings for declarations and compensation it does not already start to run from the time of the breach of procurement law, but only from the time at which the applicant knew or ought to have known of that breach of procurement law.

62. Should Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 not be amenable to such an interpretation, then the referring court would as an alternative have to look, in the context of its discretion to extend the time-limit, for a solution that was compliant with the directive. The aim of effective review as prescribed by Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 would then lead to the national court's discretion being as it were 'reduced to zero'. It would thus be obliged to grant an extension of time to an applicant such as Uniplex.

63. That extension of time would have to be at least long enough for the applicant to have available for the preparation and submission of his claim, from the point at which he knew or ought to have known of the alleged infringement of procurement law, the three months mentioned in Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006. In addition, the national court of course remains free to grant, in the exercise of its discretion, having regard to the circumstances of the individual case, a more generous extension of time, if it considers this necessary in order to arrive at a fair solution.

C – The requirement to apply for review promptly (first part of the second question)

64. By the first part of its second question, the referring court wishes essentially to know whether in review proceedings it can dismiss an action as inadmissible if it has not been submitted 'promptly'.

65. According to the limitation provision in Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006, an application for review is only admissible if it is brought 'promptly and in any event within three months from the date when grounds for the bringing of the proceedings first arose'. This requirement to initiate the review procedure promptly apparently allows the English court, in its discretion, to dismiss applications for review as inadmissible even before the expiry of the three-month period. At the hearing before the Court, the parties to the main proceedings and the United Kingdom Government agreed (43) that in their practice the English courts do in fact make use of this possibility of dismissing an application on the ground of 'lack of promptness'. (44)

66. The application of a limitation period must not, however, lead to the exercise of the right to review of award decisions being deprived of its practical effectiveness. (45)

67. Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 requires that it must be possible for decisions of contracting authorities to be reviewed 'effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible'. As I explain in more detail in my Opinion in Case C-456/08 Commission v Ireland, (46) in order to achieve that aim of the directive the Member States must create a clear legal framework in the field in question. They are obliged to establish a sufficiently precise, clear and transparent legal position, so that individuals can know what their rights and obligations are.

68. For a limitation rule such as Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006, the requirements of clarity, precision and predictability apply to a special degree. Lack of clarity with respect to the applicable time-limits is liable, in view of the threat of an action being time-barred, to entail serious harmful consequences for individuals and undertakings.

69. A limitation period such as that under Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006, the duration of which is placed at the discretion of the competent court by the criterion 'promptly', is not predictable in its effects. The tenderers and candidates concerned are uncertain as to how much time they have to prepare their applications for review properly, and they are scarcely able to estimate the prospects of success of such applications. The objective imposed by Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665 of effective review of decisions taken by the contracting authorities is thereby missed. (47)

70. In consequence, the national courts may not declare an application for review, brought within the three-month period under Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006, inadmissible on the ground of 'lack of promptness'. They are obliged to interpret and apply the provisions of national law in a manner consistent with the directive. (48) With regard specifically to review procedures under procurement law, they must – as already mentioned – interpret the national rules laying down a limitation period, as far as is at all possible, in such a way as to ensure observance of the principle of effectiveness deriving from Directive 89/665. (49)

71. In this connection I may point out that a criterion of promptness need not necessarily be understood in the sense of an independent limitation period. If a provision combines an indication of time expressed in days, weeks, months or years with the word 'promptly' or a similar expression, that addition can also be interpreted as emphasising the need for rapid action and reminding applicants of their responsibility, in their own interests, for taking the necessary steps as early as possible, in order best to protect their interests. (50)

72. Against that background, the referring court will have to examine whether the criterion of acting 'promptly' in Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 can be interpreted to the effect that it does not constitute an independent barrier to admissibility but merely contains a reference to the need for rapidity.

73. Should it not be possible to interpret Regulation 47(7)(b) of the PCR 2006 to that effect, in compliance with the directive, the national court is obliged to apply Community law to its full extent and to protect the rights it confers on individuals, if necessary by disapplying any provision whose application would in the particular case lead to a result contrary to Community law. (51)

VI – Conclusion

74. On the basis of the above considerations, I propose that the Court give the following answers to the reference for a preliminary ruling from the High Court of Justice:

(1) Article 1(1) of Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts requires that a limitation period for applications for a declaration of an infringement of procurement law and for actions for compensation does not start to run until the time at which the applicant knew or ought to have known of the alleged infringement of procurement law.

(2) Article 1(1) of Directive 89/665/EEC precludes a limitation provision which allows the national court in its discretion to dismiss applications for a declaration of an infringement of procurement law and actions for damages as inadmissible by reference to a requirement to bring proceedings promptly.

(3) The national court is obliged to do whatever lies within its jurisdiction to achieve a result compatible with the aim of Directive 89/665/EEC. If such a result cannot be achieved by way of interpreting and applying the limitation rule in a manner consistent with the directive, the national court is obliged to leave that rule unapplied.

18 – In Ireland there is an essentially similar rule on limitation periods under Order 84A(4) of the Rules of the Superior Courts (SI No 374 of 1998). That rule is the subject of the action by the Commission for failure to fulfil obligations in Case C-456/08 Commission v Ireland, in which I am also delivering my Opinion today.

---

19 – The observations of Dyson LJ in Jobsin Co UK plc v Department of Health, cited in footnote 16, which are quoted in the order for reference, are illuminating in this respect: 'A service provider's knowledge is plainly irrelevant to the question whether he has suffered or risks suffering loss or damage as a result of a breach of duty owed to him by a contracting authority. … Knowledge will often be relevant to whether there is good reason for extending time within which proceedings may be brought, but it cannot be relevant to the prior question of when the right of action first arises' (paragraphs 23 to 28 of the judgment). At the hearing before the Court, the parties were in agreement that the national court is not obliged to grant such an extension of time.

20 – There appear also to be judges in England who differ from this approach. At the hearing before the Court, the judgment of the High Court of Justice of England and Wales, Queen's Bench Division, (Coulson J) of 8 May 2009 in AmaryllisLtd v HMTreasury [2009] EWHC 962 (TCC) was mentioned in this connection.

24 – See my Opinion in pressetextNachrichtenagentur, cited in footnote 12, points 163 to 167.

---

25 – If a contract is to be declared invalid, Articles 2d and 2f(1) of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 2007/66, are relevant. If, on the other hand, compensation is to be awarded, Articles 2e and 2f(2) in conjunction with Article 2c of Directive 89/665, as amended by Directive 2007/66, apply.

---

26 – That is also supported by Regulation 47(9) of the PCR 2006. NHS Business Services admittedly points out that in the main proceedings Uniplex made more extensive claims. However, in relation to the factual and legal context of references for preliminary rulings, the Court must proceed from the statements made by the referring court (settled case-law; see Joined Cases C-482/01 and C-493/01 Orfanopoulos and Oliveri [2004] ECR I-5257, paragraph 42, and Case C-244/06 DynamicMedien [2008] ECR I-505, paragraph 19).

27 – See my Opinion in pressetextNachrichtenagentur, cited in footnote 12, point 171.

---

28 – Cited in footnote 15, paragraph 78.

29 – This is also clear in the French version of Universale-Bau and Others, French being the language in which the judgment was drafted and deliberated on: dès qu'elles sont connues des intéressés (judgment cited in footnote 15, paragraph 78).

---

30 – Interestingly, NHS Business Services leaves out precisely this paragraph 78 of the judgment in Universale-Bau and Others, although it otherwise cites the full text of the relevant passage of the Court's reasoning (paragraphs 74 to 79).

31 – The parties to the main proceedings disagree as to whether Uniplex ought to have known of the alleged infringements of procurement law from the letter of 22 November 2007 or only from the letter of NHS Business Services of 13 December 2007 (see points 12 and 13 above). After reading those two letters, it seems to me that the first of them confines itself to extremely general statements from which an unsuccessful tenderer can hardly work out why he was unsuccessful and whether procurement law was applied correctly. The second letter, on the other hand, contains at least two statements which arouse the suspicion that infringements of procurement law were committed. First, Uniplex is given a zero mark in the category 'Price and other cost-effectiveness factors' because it offered only its list price; the contracting authority appears to have completely ignored the fact that one tenderer's list price may be lower than another's discount price, and that what ultimately matters is the comparison of the prices actually offered. Second, all tenderers who had not previously been active in the market for haemostats in the United Kingdom were apparently marked at zero in the category 'UK customer base', which suggests covert discrimination against tenderers from other countries. In the end, however, it will be the task of the referring court to make the necessary findings in this respect.

33 – The same may apply if a tenderer or candidate complains of a breach of procurement law and his complaint is rejected by the contracting authority with reasons being given.

34 – To that effect, Case 222/86 Heylens and Others [1987] ECR 4097, paragraph 15, and Case C-75/08 Mellor [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 59; see also my Opinion in Case C-186/04 Housieaux [2005] ECR I-3299, point 32, and my Opinion in Mellor, especially point 31.

36 – That the term ‘occurrence of the damage’ was used in the first sentence of point 167 of my Opinion in pressetextNachrichtenagentur, cited in footnote 12, is an editing mistake. The correct version is that it suffices that the person concerned knew or ought to have known of the alleged infringement of procurement law, as follows from points 169 and 171 of that Opinion.

37 – To that effect, Case C-15/04 Koppensteiner [2005] ECR I-4855, paragraph 38, and Lämmerzahl, cited in footnote 15, second sentence of paragraph 63.

43 – Ireland submitted in the present proceedings for a preliminary ruling that the essentially identical limitation rule in Irish law (in accordance with Order 84A(4) of the Rules of the Superior Courts, an application for review must be made ‘at the earliest opportunity and in any event within three months’) does not produce any such effects. Nevertheless, in the proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations which are being heard in parallel to the present case, Ireland indicated that in certain circumstances an application for review may under Irish law be dismissed as out of time even if it has been made within the three-month period (see on this point my Opinion of today’s date in Case C-456/08 Commission v Ireland, point 70).

Advocate General: J. Kokott,

Registrar: R. Grass,

having regard to the written procedure,

after considering the observations submitted on behalf of:

– the Commission of the European Communities, by C. Zadra and D. Recchia, acting as Agents, having decided, after hearing the Advocate General, to proceed to judgment without an Opinion,

gives the following

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 4 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114), Articles 39 EC, 43 EC, 49 EC and 81 EC, and the general principles of equal treatment and proportionality.

2 The reference was made in the course of proceedings between the construction company Serrantoni Srl ('Serrantoni') and the Comune di Milano (Municipality of Milan), regarding the decision of the Comune di Milano to exclude Serrantoni from participating in a procedure for the award of a public works contract.

Legal context

3 Recital 2 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 states:

'The award of contracts concluded in the Member States on behalf of the State, regional or local authorities and other bodies governed by public law entities, is subject to the respect of the principles of the [EC] Treaty and in particular to the principle of freedom of movement of goods, the principle of freedom of establishment and the principle of freedom to provide services and to the principles deriving therefrom, such as the principle of equal treatment, the principle of non-discrimination, the principle of mutual recognition, the principle of proportionality and the principle of transparency. However, for public contracts above a certain value, it is advisable to draw up provisions of Community coordination of national procedures for the award of such contracts which are based on these principles so as to ensure the effects of them and to guarantee the opening-up of public procurement to competition. These coordinating provisions should therefore be interpreted in accordance with both the aforementioned rules and principles and other rules of the Treaty.'

4 Article 2 of that directive provides:

'Contracting authorities shall treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and shall act in a transparent way.'

5 Article 4 of the directive, under the heading 'Economic operators', provides:

'1. Candidates or tenderers who, under the law of the Member State in which they are established, are entitled to provide the relevant service, shall not be rejected solely on the ground that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they would be required to be either natural or legal persons.

2. Groups of economic operators may submit tenders or put themselves forward as candidates. In order to submit a tender or a request to participate, these groups may not be required by the contracting authorities to assume a specific legal form; however, the group selected may be required to do so when it has been awarded the contract, to the extent that this change is necessary for the satisfactory performance of the contract.'

6 In accordance with the version of Article 7(c) of Directive 2004/18 in force at the material time as a result of the adaptation effected by Commission Regulation (EC) No 2083/2005 of 19 December 2005 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts (OJ 2005 L 333, p. 28), Directive 2004/18 applied to public works contracts which had a value exclusive of value added tax estimated to be equal to or greater than EUR 5 278 000.

7 Article 45 of that directive, headed 'Personal situation of the candidate or tenderer', provides in paragraph 2:

'Any economic operator may be excluded from participation in a contract where that economic operator:

(a) is bankrupt or is being wound up, where his affairs are being administered by the court, where he has entered into an arrangement with creditors, where he has suspended business activities or is in any analogous situation arising from a similar procedure under national laws and regulations;

(b) is the subject of proceedings for a declaration of bankruptcy, for an order for compulsory winding up or administration by the court or of an arrangement with creditors or of any other similar proceedings under national laws and regulations;

(c) has been convicted by a judgment which has the force of res judicata in accordance with the legal provisions of the country of any offence concerning his professional conduct;

(d) has been guilty of grave professional misconduct proven by any means which the contracting authorities can demonstrate;

(e) has not fulfilled obligations relating to the payment of social security contributions in accordance with the legal provisions of the country in which he is established or with those of the country of the contracting authority;

(f) has not fulfilled obligations relating to the payment of taxes in accordance with the legal provisions of the country in which he is established or with those of the country of the contracting authority;

(g) is guilty of serious misrepresentation in supplying the information required under this Section or has not supplied such information.

Member States shall specify, in accordance with their national law and having regard for Community law, the implementing conditions for this paragraph.'

National legislation

8 Legislative Decree No 163 of 12 April 2006 establishing the Code on public works contracts, public service contracts and public supply contracts pursuant to Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC (Codice dei contratti pubblici relativi a lavori, servizi e forniture in attuazione delle direttive 2004/17/CE e 2004/18/CE) (Ordinary Supplement to GURI No 100 of 2 May 2006, 'Legislative Decree No 163/2006'), governs, in their entirety, the procedures in Italy for the award of public works contracts, public service contracts and public supply contracts. Article 34 of that legislative decree, as amended by Legislative Decree No 113 of 31 July 2007, entitled 'Entities to which public contracts may be awarded', provides in paragraph 1:

'1. Without prejudice to the restrictions expressly provided for, the following entities are entitled to participate in the procedures for the award of public procurement contracts:

(b) consortia of producers' and workers' cooperatives … and consortia of artisan/handicraft businesses …;

(c) permanent consortia, constituted as joint venture companies ..., between individual contractors (including artisans), commercial companies or partnerships or producers' and workers' cooperatives, in accordance with the provisions of Article 36;

(f) entities which have entered into a European Economic Interest Group [EEIG] …;

(f a) economic operators … established in other Member States and constituted according to the applicable legislation of the Member State concerned.'

9 Article 36(1) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 provides:

'"Permanent consortia" ("consorzi stabili") mean those … which, by a decision of their respective management, have agreed to participate jointly in public works contracts, public service contracts and public supply contracts, for a period of not less than five years, creating a joint undertaking structure for that purpose.'

10 Article 36(5) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, in the version in force at the material time, provided:

'… a permanent consortium may not participate in the same award procedure as members of that consortium; in the event of failure to comply with this provision, Article 353 of the Criminal Code shall apply ...'.

11 Article 37(7) of that legislative decree, in the version in force at the material time, provided:

'… The consortia referred to in Article 34(1)(b) are required to specify in the tender the members for which the consortium is competing: those members are precluded from participating, in any other form, in the same tendering procedure; in the event of infringement, both the consortium and the member shall be excluded from the procedure; in the event of failure to comply with this provision, Article 353 of the Criminal Code shall apply …'

12 Under Article 353 of the Criminal Code, the failure to comply with the above prohibition is punishable by up to two years' imprisonment and, in certain circumstances by up to five years' imprisonment, and by a fine.

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

13 In 2007 the Comune di Milano issued a call for tenders relating to the award of a works contract concerning 'emergency and rationalisation measures for district registry offices, lot V'. On 27 September 2007, the Comune di Milano decided to exclude Serrantoni, a member of the permanent consortium Consorzio stabile edili Scrl, as well as the permanent consortium itself, from the tendering procedure for breach of Article 36(5) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006. On the basis of the same provision, the Comune di Milano also ordered the documents to be forwarded to the Public Prosecutor's office for the application of Article 353 of the Criminal Code, and awarded the contract to another company.

14 Serrantoni and the permanent consortium to which it belongs brought an appeal before the referring court against that decision of the contracting authority, submitting that Article 36(5) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 is incompatible with Article 4 of Directive 2004/18, Articles 39 EC, 43 EC, 49 EC and 81 EC, and with the principle of non-discrimination.

15 The referring court points out, first of all, that the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings makes a distinction between permanent consortia, on the one hand, and consortia of producers' and workers' cooperatives and consortia of artisan/handicraft businesses, on the other. As regards permanent consortia, there is an absolute prohibition on the consortium and the companies forming part thereof participating in the same procedure simultaneously by separate tenders, on pain of automatic exclusion from the procedure and criminal sanctions. As regards the consortia of producers' and workers' cooperatives and consortia of artisan/handicraft businesses, that prohibition applies only to the consortium and the company in whose interests that consortium submitted a tender in the tendering procedure in question. That court observes that, in the case at issue in the main proceedings, the permanent consortium in question did not participate in the call for tenders in Serrantoni's interests.

16 The referring court notes, next, that the different forms of consortium referred to above do not exhibit any differences in respect of their aims and organisation that would justify such unequal treatment. All those forms of consortium are characterised by a common organisation for the purposes of instituting cooperation between the member companies in order to reduce management costs, to optimise their respective economic results and to increase their competitiveness in relation to public contracts. The referring court therefore asks whether the difference in treatment in question is compatible with the principle of non-discrimination and with the Community requirement to ensure the widest possible participation in public tendering procedures.

17 The referring court also asks whether that difference in treatment is compatible with Article 4 of Directive 2004/18, to the extent that the exclusion in question is based solely on the fact that the entity takes the legal form of a permanent consortium, and with Articles 39 EC, 43 EC, 49 EC and 81 EC. That discrimination is moreover of particular importance since the institution of consortia has been amply provided for in the legal systems of the other Member States and finds expression at the Community level in the form of European Economic Interest Groupings (EEIGs).

18 Lastly, the referring court points out that the absolute prohibition in question is based exclusively on a formal aspect, that is to say whether a company forms part of a particular type of group. The legislation in question makes no call for a specific assessment of the mutual influence exerted between consortium and member company but, on the contrary, posits an abstract presumption of mutual interference. Thus, that court notes, even if the consortium is not participating in the tendering procedure in the interests of the company concerned, is not using the company for the execution of the contract, and therefore has no agreement with that company concerning the submission of the tender, the absolute prohibition is applicable. It therefore asks whether that absolute prohibition may be justified by an overriding requirement in the general interest relating to the need to ensure that public tendering procedures are properly conducted, and whether it does not go far beyond its objective.

19 In the light of those considerations, the Tribunale amministrativo regionale per la Lombardia (Regional Administrative Court, Lombardy) decided to stay proceedings and refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

‘(1) Is the correct application of Article 4 of Directive 2004/18 … impeded by the provisions of national law laid down in Article 36(5) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 …, under which:

– where a member of a consortium participates in a tendering procedure for a public contract, the consortium itself is automatically excluded from participation solely on the ground that it has a particular legal form (that of a permanent consortium) rather than another, essentially identical, legal form (that of a consortium of producers’ and workers’ cooperatives or a consortium of artisan/handicraft businesses); and

– where a permanent consortium participates in a tendering procedure for a public contract, and where it has declared that it is competing on behalf of other companies and that it will entrust the works to other companies if it is awarded the contract, a company is automatically excluded from participation solely on the formal ground that it is a member of that consortium?

(2) Is the correct application of Articles 39 EC, 43 EC, 49 EC and 81 EC impeded by the provisions of national law laid down in Article 36(5) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 …, under which:

– where a member of a consortium participates in a tendering procedure for a public contract, the consortium itself is automatically excluded from participation solely on the ground that it has a particular legal form (that of a permanent consortium) rather than another, essentially identical, legal form (a consortium of producers’ and workers’ cooperatives or a consortium of artisan/handicraft businesses), and

– where a permanent consortium participates in a tendering procedure for a public contract, and where it has declared that it is competing on behalf of other companies and that it will entrust the works to other companies if it is awarded the contract, a company is automatically excluded from participation solely on the formal ground that it is a member of that consortium?’

The questions referred for a preliminary ruling

20 First of all, it should be observed that, as is clear from the file submitted to the Court, the value of the contract to which the award procedure at issue in the main proceedings relates is considerably lower than the threshold laid down in Article 7(c) of Directive 2004/18. Consequently, that contract does not fall within the scope of the procedures laid down in that directive.

21 None the less, it should be recalled that the fact that the value of a contract is below the threshold set by the Community rules does not, however, mean that that contract is not subject at all to the application of Community law.

22 It is clear from the Court's settled case-law that, in the context of the award of a contract with a value below that threshold, the fundamental rules of the Treaty and in particular the principle of equal treatment must be complied with. The distinguishing feature in relation to contracts with a value above the threshold prescribed by the provisions of Directive 2004/18 is that only the latter are subject to the strict special procedures laid down in those provisions (see, to that effect, Joined Cases C-147/06 and C-148/06 SECAP and Santorso [2008] ECR I-3565, paragraphs 19 and 20).

23 That interpretation is confirmed by recital 2 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18, which states that the award of all contracts concluded in the Member States on behalf of bodies with the status of a contracting authority must comply with the basic rules of the Treaty, and in particular with those concerning freedom of movement of goods and services, the right of establishment and the fundamental principles deriving therefrom, such as the principles of equal treatment, proportionality and transparency.

24 However, according to the case-law of the Court, the application of the fundamental rules and general principles of the Treaty to procedures for the award of contracts below the threshold for the application of Community provisions is based on the premiss that the contracts in question are of certain cross-border interest (SECAP and Santorso, paragraph 21 and case-law cited).

25 In that connection, the Court has already pointed out that it is for the referring court to carry out a detailed assessment of all the relevant facts concerning the contract in question in order to determine whether there is certain cross-border interest (SECAP and Santorso, paragraph 34). In the present case, the answers to the questions referred take as their premiss that it is none the less for the referring court to ascertain whether the contract in question involves certain cross-border interest.

The first question

26 By this question, the referring court asks whether Article 4 of Directive 2004/18 must be interpreted as precluding national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which provides that both a permanent consortium and its member companies are automatically excluded from participating in a procedure for the award of a public contract and face criminal sanctions where the member companies have submitted tenders in competition with that consortium's tender in the context of the procedure in question, even if the consortium's tender was not submitted on behalf and in the interests of those companies.

27 In that connection, as has been noted in paragraph 20 of this judgment, the contract at issue in the main proceedings does not fall within the scope of the procedures laid down in that directive, since its value is below the threshold laid down in Article 7(c) of Directive 2004/18.

28 Accordingly, there is no need to answer the question referred by the national court.

The second question

29 By this question, considered in the light of the reference for a preliminary ruling taken as a whole, the referring court asks whether the general principles of equal treatment and proportionality deriving from Articles 43 EC and 49 EC and Articles 39 EC and 81 EC must be interpreted as precluding national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which provides that both a permanent consortium and its member companies are automatically excluded from participating in a procedure for the award of a public contract and face criminal sanctions where the member companies have submitted tenders in competition with the consortium's tender in the context of the same procedure, even if that consortium's tender was not submitted on behalf and in the interests of those companies.

30 As regards the Treaty articles to which the national court refers, it should be noted, first of all, that the exclusion at issue in the main proceedings has no connection with freedom of movement for workers, or with agreements between undertakings or decisions by associations of undertakings, within the meaning of Articles 39 EC and 81 EC. There is therefore no need for the Court to give an answer with regard to those articles.

31 As regards the principles of equal treatment and transparency, the Member States must be recognised as having a certain amount of discretion for the purpose of adopting measures intended to ensure compliance with those principles, which are binding on contracting authorities in any procedure for the award of a public contract (see, to that effect, Case C-213/07 Michaniki [2008] ECR I-0000, paragraph 44).

32 Each Member State is best placed to identify, in the light of historical, legal, economic or social considerations specific to it, situations propitious to conduct liable to bring about breaches of those principles (see Michaniki, paragraph 56).

33 However, in accordance with the principle of proportionality, which constitutes a general principle of Community law (see, inter alia, Case C-210/03 Swedish Match [2004] ECR I-11893, paragraph 47), the measures adopted by the Member States must not go beyond what is necessary to achieve that objective (see, to that effect, Michaniki, paragraphs 48 and 61, and Case C-538/07 Assitur [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 21 and 23).

34 First, as regards the principles of equal treatment and of proportionality, it should be noted that the legislation at issue in the main proceedings provides for the automatic exclusion from participation in a public tendering procedure in the event of simultaneous and competing tenders submitted by a permanent consortium and by one or more companies forming part thereof.

35 In that connection, it must be pointed out that the automatic exclusion at issue in the main proceedings is only applicable to permanent consortia and the companies of which they are composed, and not to other forms of consortium, such as consortia of producers' and workers' cooperatives and consortia of artisan/handicraft businesses. As regards the latter forms of consortium, the exclusion is applicable, in accordance with Article 37(7) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, only where competing tenders are submitted by the consortium in question and by those of its member companies on whose behalf the consortium itself has submitted a tender.

36 In that connection, the referring court notes that all those forms of consortium are essentially identical and do not exhibit any differences in respect of their aims and organisation that would justify such unequal treatment.

37 It must therefore be found that the automatic exclusion measure at issue in the main proceedings, which concerns only the permanent consortium form and its member companies and is applicable in the event of competing tenders, regardless of whether the consortium concerned participates in the public tendering procedure in question on behalf and in the interests of the companies which have submitted a tender, constitutes discrimination against that form of consortium, and does not therefore comply with the principle of equal treatment.

38 It should be added that, even if the treatment in question applied without distinction to all forms of consortium, or the national court found that there were objective elements which distinguished the situation of permanent consortia from that of other forms of consortium, a rule requiring automatic exclusion, such as the rule at issue in the main proceedings, would not in any event be compatible with the principle of proportionality.

39 A rule of that kind involves an irrebutable presumption of mutual interference in cases in which a consortium and one or more of its member companies have submitted competing tenders in the same procedure for the award of a public contract, even where the consortium in question has not participated in the procedure on behalf and in the interests of those companies, without either the consortium or the companies concerned being afforded the possibility of showing that their tenders were drawn up completely independently and that there is therefore no risk of influencing competition between tenderers (see, to that effect, Michaniki, paragraph 67, and Assitur, paragraph 30, in relation to the public contracts falling within the scope of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199,

p. 54) and Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1).

40 A systematic rule of exclusion, which also entails an absolute obligation on the contracting authorities to exclude the entities concerned, even in cases in which the relationship between those entities has no effect on their conduct in the context of the procedures in which they have participated, is contrary to the Community interest in ensuring the widest possible participation by tenderers in a call for tenders, and goes beyond what is necessary to achieve the objective of ensuring the application of the principles of equal treatment and transparency (see, to that effect, Assitur, paragraphs 26 to 29, with regard to public contracts falling within the scope of Directive 92/50).

41 Second, it should be noted that, in accordance with the settled case-law of the Court, Articles 43 EC and 49 EC preclude any national measure which, even though it is applicable without discrimination on grounds of nationality, is liable to prohibit, impede or render less attractive the exercise by Community nationals of the freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services guaranteed by those provisions of the Treaty (see, to that effect, Case C-299/02 Commission v Netherlands [2004] ECR I-9761, paragraph 15, and Case C-433/04 Commission v Belgium [2006] ECR I-10653, paragraph 28).

42 As the Commission of the European Communities rightly observes, a national rule such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which provides that permanent consortia and their member companies may be automatically excluded, is likely to have a dissuasive effect on economic operators established in other Member States, that it so to say, first, on operators wishing to establish themselves in the Member State concerned through the establishment of a permanent consortium, possibly composed of national and foreign companies, and, second, on operators intending to join consortia of that kind already in existence, in order to be able to participate more easily in public tendering procedures launched by the contracting authorities of that Member State and thereby be able to offer their services more easily.

43 A national measure of that kind which is likely to have a dissuasive effect on economic operators established in other Member States constitutes a restriction within the meaning of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC (see, to that effect, Commission v Belgium, paragraph 29), all the more so as that dissuasive effect is heightened by the risk of criminal sanctions which are laid down in the national legislation at issue in the main proceedings.

44 However, a restriction such as that at issue in the main proceedings may possibly be justified in so far as it pursues a legitimate objective in the public interest, and to the extent that it is suitable for securing the attainment of the objective and does not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain it.

45 In the present case, it must be found that, notwithstanding its legitimate objective of combating possible collusion between the consortium concerned and its member companies, the restriction in question cannot be justified since, as is clear from paragraphs 38 to 40 of this judgment, it goes beyond what is necessary to achieve that objective.

46 The answer to the second question must therefore be that Community law must be interpreted as precluding national legislation, such at that at issue in the main proceedings, which provides that, when a public contract is being awarded, with a value below the threshold laid down in Article 7(c) of Directive 2004/18 but of certain cross-border interest, both a permanent consortium and its member companies are automatically excluded from participating in that procedure and face criminal sanctions where those companies have submitted tenders in competition with the consortium's tender in the context of the same procedure, even if the consortium's tender was not submitted on behalf and in the interests of those companies.

Costs

47 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Fourth Chamber) hereby rules:

Community law must be interpreted as precluding national legislation, such at that at issue in the main proceedings, which provides that, when a public contract is being awarded, with a value below the threshold laid down in Article 7(c) of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts, but of certain cross-border interest, both a permanent consortium and its member companies are automatically excluded from participating in that procedure and face criminal sanctions where those companies have submitted tenders in competition with the consortium's tender in the context of the same procedure, even if the consortium's tender was not submitted on behalf and in the interests of those companies.

Arrêt

1 Par sa requête, la Commission des Communautés européennes demande à la Cour de constater que:

– en adoptant et en maintenant en vigueur l'article 44-I du décret n° 2005-1308, du 20 octobre 2005, relatif aux marchés passés par les entités adjudicatrices mentionnées à l'article 4 de l'ordonnance n° 2005-649 du 6 juin 2005 relative aux marchés passés par certaines personnes publiques ou privées non soumises au code des marchés publics (JORF du 22 octobre 2005, p. 16752), l'article 46-I du décret n° 2005-1742, du 30 décembre 2005, fixant les règles applicables aux marchés passés par les pouvoirs adjudicateurs mentionnés à l'article 3 de l'ordonnance n° 2005-649 (JORF du 31 décembre 2005, p. 20782), et l'article 80-I-1° du décret n° 2006-975, du 1^er^ août 2006, portant code des marchés publics (JORF du 4 août 2006, p. 11627, ci-après le «code des marchés publics»), dans la mesure où ces dispositions prévoient la possibilité pour les pouvoirs adjudicateurs et/ou entités adjudicatrices de réduire le délai raisonnable à respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux soumissionnaires et la signature du marché sans aucune limite de temps et sans aucune condition objective fixée préalablement par la réglementation nationale, et la République française a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu des directives 89/665/CEE du Conseil, du 21 décembre 1989, portant coordination des dispositions législatives, réglementaires et administratives relatives à l'application des procédures de recours en matière de passation des marchés publics de fournitures et de travaux (JO L 395, p. 33), telle que modifiée par la directive 92/50/CEE du Conseil, du 18 juin 1992 (JO L 209, p. 1, ci-après la «directive 89/665»), et 92/13/CEE du Conseil, du 25 février 1992, portant coordination des dispositions législatives, réglementaires et administratives relatives à l'application des règles communautaires sur les procédures de passation des marchés des entités opérant dans les secteurs de l'eau, de l'énergie, des transports et des télécommunications (JO L 76, p. 14), telles qu'interprétées par la Cour dans ses arrêts du 28 octobre 1999, Alcatel Austria e.a. (C-81/98, Rec. p. I-7671), et du 24 juin 2004, Commission/Autriche (C-212/02), et plus particulièrement en vertu des articles 2, paragraphe 1, de la directive 89/665 et 2, paragraphe 1, de la directive 92/13.

– en adoptant et en maintenant en vigueur l'article 1441-1 du nouveau code de procédure civile, tel que modifié par le décret n° 2005-1308, dans la mesure où cette disposition prévoit un délai de dix jours pour la réponse du pouvoir adjudicateur et/ou de l'entité adjudicatrice concernés interdisant tout référé précontractuel avant ladite réponse et sans que ce délai suspende le délai à respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux soumissionnaires et la signature du marché,

Le cadre juridique

La réglementation communautaire

2 L'article 1er de la directive 89/665 prévoit:

3. Les États membres assurent que les procédures de recours sont accessibles, selon des modalités que les États membres peuvent déterminer, au moins à toute personne ayant ou ayant eu un intérêt à obtenir un marché public de fournitures ou de travaux déterminé et ayant été ou [risquant] d'être lésée par une violation alléguée. En particulier, ils peuvent exiger que la personne qui souhaite utiliser une telle procédure ait préalablement informé le pouvoir adjudicateur de la violation alléguée et de son intention d'introduire un recours.»

3 L'article 2, paragraphe 1, de la même directive dispose:

«Les États membres veillent à ce que les mesures prises aux fins des recours visés à l'article 1er prévoient les pouvoirs permettant:

a) de prendre, dans les délais les plus brefs et par voie de référé, des mesures provisoires ayant pour but de corriger la violation alléguée ou d'empêcher d'autres dommages d'être causés aux intérêts concernés, y compris des mesures destinées à suspendre ou à faire suspendre la procédure de passation de marché public en cause ou de l'exécution de toute décision prise par les pouvoirs adjudicateurs;

4 L'article 1er de la directive 92/13 est libellé comme suit:

«1. Les États membres prennent les mesures nécessaires pour assurer que les décisions prises par les entités adjudicatrices peuvent faire l'objet de recours efficaces et, en particulier, aussi rapides que possible, dans les conditions énoncées aux articles suivants, et notamment à l'article 2 paragraphe 8, au motif que ces décisions ont violé le droit communautaire en matière de passation des marchés ou les règles nationales transposant ce droit en ce qui concerne:

a) les procédures de passation des marchés relevant de la directive 90/531/CEE

b) le respect de l'article 3 paragraphe 2 point a) de ladite directive, dans le cas des entités adjudicatrices auxquelles cette disposition s'applique.

[…]

3. Les États membres veillent à ce que les procédures de recours soient accessibles, selon des modalités que les États membres peuvent déterminer, au moins à toute personne ayant ou ayant eu un intérêt à obtenir un marché déterminé et ayant été ou risquant d'être lésée par une violation alléguée. En particulier, ils peuvent exiger que la personne qui souhaite l'application d'une telle procédure ait préalablement informé l'entité adjudicatrice de la violation alléguée et de son intention d'introduire un recours.»

5 L'article 2, paragraphe 1, de la même directive dispose:

soit

a) de prendre, dans les délais les plus brefs et par voie de référé, des mesures provisoires ayant pour but de corriger la violation alléguée ou d'empêcher que d'autres préjudices soient causés aux intérêts concernés, y compris des mesures destinées à suspendre ou à faire suspendre la procédure de passation de marché en cause ou l'exécution de toute décision prise par l'entité adjudicatrice

c) de prendre, dans les délais les plus brefs, si possible par voie de référé et, si nécessaire, par une procédure définitive quant au fond, d'autres mesures que celles prévues aux points a) et b), ayant pour but de corriger la violation constatée et d'empêcher que des préjudices soient causés aux intérêts concernés; notamment d'émettre un ordre de paiement d'une somme déterminée dans le cas où l'infraction n'est pas corrigée ou évitée.

7 L'article 1er de la directive 2007/66 remplace les articles 1er et 2 de la directive 89/665 par le texte suivant:

4. Les États membres peuvent exiger que la personne qui souhaite faire usage d'une procédure de recours ait informé le pouvoir adjudicateur de la violation alléguée et de son intention d'introduire un recours, pour autant que cela n'ait pas d'incidence sur le délai de suspension visé à l'article 2 bis, paragraphe 2, ou sur tout autre délai d'introduction d'un recours visé à l'article 2 quater.

5. Les États membres peuvent exiger que la personne concernée introduise en premier lieu un recours auprès du pouvoir adjudicateur. Dans ce cas, les États membres veillent à ce que l'introduction dudit recours entraîne la suspension immédiate de la possibilité de conclure le marché.

Les États membres décident des moyens de communication adéquats, y compris les télécopieurs ou les moyens électroniques, qu'il convient d'utiliser pour introduire un recours conformément au premier alinéa.

La suspension visée au premier alinéa ne prend pas fin avant l'expiration d'un délai d'au moins dix jours calendaires à compter du lendemain du jour où le pouvoir adjudicateur a envoyé une réponse si un télécopieur ou un moyen électronique est utilisé, ou, si un autre moyen de communication est utilisé, avant l'expiration d'un délai d'au moins quinze jours calendaires à compter du lendemain du jour où le pouvoir adjudicateur a envoyé une réponse, ou d'au moins dix jours calendaires à compter du lendemain du jour de réception d'une réponse.

Article 2 bis

2. La conclusion du contrat qui suit la décision d'attribution d'un marché relevant du champ d'application de la directive 2004/18/CE ne peut avoir lieu avant l'expiration d'un délai d'au moins dix jours calendaires à compter du lendemain du jour où la décision d'attribution du marché a été envoyée aux soumissionnaires et candidats concernés si un télécopieur ou un moyen électronique est utilisé ou, si d'autres moyens de communication sont utilisés, avant l'expiration d'un délai d'au moins quinze jours calendaires à compter du lendemain du jour où la décision d'attribution du marché est envoyée aux soumissionnaires et candidats concernés, ou d'au moins dix jours calendaires à compter du lendemain du jour de réception de la décision d'attribution du marché.

8 L'article 2 de la directive 2007/66 apporte au texte de la directive 92/13 des modifications analogues à celles mentionnées au point précédent.

9 En vertu de son article 4, la directive 2007/66 est entrée en vigueur le 9 janvier 2008. Aux termes de l'article 3, paragraphe 1, premier alinéa, de cette directive, les États membres doivent mettre en vigueur les dispositions législatives, administratives et réglementaires nécessaires pour se conformer à celle-ci au plus tard le 20 décembre 2009.

La réglementation nationale

10 L'article 44-I du décret n° 2005-1308 prévoit:

Un délai d'au moins dix jours est respecté entre la date à laquelle la décision de rejet est notifiée aux candidats dont l'offre n'a pas été retenue et la date de signature du marché ou de l'accord-cadre.

11 L'article 46-I du décret n° 2005-1742 dispose:

Un délai d'au moins dix jours est respecté entre la date à laquelle la décision de rejet est notifiée aux candidats dont l'offre n'a pas été retenue et la date de signature du marché ou de l'accord-cadre.

12 L'article 80-I-1° du code des marchés publics est libellé comme suit:

Un délai d'au moins dix jours est respecté entre la date à laquelle la décision de rejet est notifiée aux candidats dont l'offre n'a pas été retenue et la date de signature du marché ou de l'accord-cadre.

En cas d'urgence ne permettant pas de respecter ce délai de dix jours, il est réduit dans des proportions adaptées à la situation.»

13 L'article 1441-1 du nouveau code de procédure civile, tel que modifié par l'article 48-1° du décret n° 2005-1308 (ci-après l'«article 1441-1 du code de procédure civile»), dispose:

En cas de refus ou d'absence de réponse dans un délai de dix jours, l'auteur de la mise en demeure peut saisir le président de la juridiction compétente ou son délégué, qui statue dans un délai de vingt jours.»

La procédure précontentieuse

14 Le 21 mars 2005, la Commission a adressé une lettre de mise en demeure à la République française par laquelle elle attirait l'attention de cette dernière sur le problème de la conformité avec le droit communautaire de certaines dispositions de la réglementation nationale relative à la protection juridictionnelle des soumissionnaires en matière de passation de marchés publics. Le 15 décembre 2006, la Commission a adressé au même État membre une lettre de mise en demeure complémentaire. Les autorités françaises ont répondu à celle-ci par lettre du 8 mars 2007.

15 N'étant pas convaincue par cette réponse, la Commission a, le 1er février 2008, émis un avis motivé invitant la République française à prendre les mesures nécessaires pour s'y conformer dans un délai de deux mois à compter de la réception de celui-ci.

16 La République française a répondu à cet avis motivé par lettre du 29 avril 2008. N'étant pas satisfaite de cette réponse, la Commission a décidé d'introduire le présent recours.

Sur le recours

17 Sans soulever formellement une exception d'irrecevabilité, la République française invoque des arguments qui laissent entendre que le présent recours serait dépourvu d'objet. Il convient d'examiner cette question en premier lieu.

Sur la question de savoir si le recours est dépourvu d'objet

18 La République française relève que la directive 2007/66 a créé pour les États membres de nouvelles obligations en matière de suspension de la conclusion du marché et de recours précontractuels visant précisément à régler les situations qui font l'objet du présent recours. Dès lors, la transposition de cette directive dans l'ordre juridique français aurait pour effet de rendre ce recours sans objet.

19 Ledit État membre indique que la procédure de transposition de la directive 2007/66 en droit français est en cours. Le nouveau régime des recours instauré par cette directive serait complexe et nécessiterait une approche globale, comprenant également les matières faisant l'objet du présent recours.

20 La Commission soutient que la transposition de la directive 2007/66 est dépourvue de pertinence au regard du présent recours. Elle fait valoir que le délai imparti dans l'avis motivé pour mettre la réglementation nationale en conformité avec les directives 89/665 et 92/13 a expiré le 1er avril 2008 et que cette réglementation, qui met en cause l'effet utile de ces directives, demeurera en vigueur jusqu'à l'adoption des mesures nécessaires à la transposition de la directive 2007/66, à savoir jusqu'au 20 décembre 2009 au plus tard.

21 La République française suggère que la mise en œuvre imminente de la directive 2007/66 prive d'objet le présent recours qui reproche à cet État membre de ne pas avoir transposé dans son ordre juridique les directives 89/665 et 92/13.

22 Selon une jurisprudence constante, l'existence d'un manquement doit être appréciée en fonction de la situation de l'État membre en cause telle qu'elle se présentait au terme du délai fixé dans l'avis motivé (voir, notamment, arrêt du 21 février 2008, Commission/Italie, C-412/04, Rec. p. I-619, point 42 et jurisprudence citée).

23 À cet égard, il est constant que, à la date à laquelle le délai fixé dans l'avis motivé est venu à expiration, les directives 89/665 et 92/13 ainsi que la législation française y afférente trouvaient encore à s'appliquer et, partant, un recours fondé sur le défaut de transposition de ces directives n'était pas dépourvu d'objet.

24 La République française laisse en outre entendre que le présent recours n'a aucune utilité pratique dans la mesure où, même si les griefs soulevés par la Commission étaient retenus par la Cour, les mesures d'exécution conséquentes ne pourraient être prises que dans le cadre global de la mise en œuvre de la directive 2007/66.

25 Ces considérations concernent l'opportunité de l'introduction du présent recours.

26 Selon une jurisprudence constante de la Cour, c'est à la Commission qu'il incombe d'apprécier l'opportunité d'agir contre un État membre, les considérations qui déterminent ce choix ne pouvant affecter la recevabilité du recours (arrêt du 8 décembre 2005, Commission/Luxembourg, C-33/04, Rec. p. I-10629, point 66 et jurisprudence citée).

27 Par conséquent, il convient d'examiner le recours de la Commission au fond.

Sur le premier grief

28 Le troisième alinéa des articles 44-I du décret n° 2005-1308, 46-I du décret n° 2005-1742 et 80-I-1° du code des marchés publics (ci-après les «dispositions litigieuses») prévoient en des termes identiques que, «[e]n cas d'urgence ne permettant pas de respecter ce délai de dix jours, ce délai est réduit dans des proportions adaptées à la situation».

29 La Commission fait valoir que la notion d'urgence mentionnée dans les dispositions litigieuses n'est pas définie, mais est au contraire laissée à l'appréciation discrétionnaire du pouvoir adjudicateur ou de l'entité adjudicatrice sans qu'aucune condition objective soit requise. S'il semble résulter du libellé de ces dispositions que le pouvoir adjudicateur ou l'entité adjudicatrice ne saurait aller jusqu'à supprimer purement et simplement le délai en question, rien ne semblerait en revanche interdire de réduire celui-ci à une durée minimale.

30 La Commission soutient en outre qu'il n'existe aucune garantie réglementaire que le nombre de jours de réduction dudit délai sera porté à la connaissance des soumissionnaires, ces derniers pouvant ne pas être informés de la durée exacte de ce délai.

32 Pour la Commission, le délai de dix jours à respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux soumissionnaires et la signature du marché est un délai minimal pour l'introduction d’un recours utile, raison pour laquelle il n’est envisageable de raccourcir ce délai que dans des circonstances objectives exceptionnelles.

33 La République française argue que les dispositions litigieuses encadrent strictement les possibilités de réduction du délai à respecter entre la notification des soumissionnaires et la signature du marché. Dès lors que ces dispositions prévoient que le délai en question ne peut être réduit que dans des proportions adaptées à la situation, cette réduction ne serait pas laissée à l’entière discrétion des pouvoirs adjudicateurs, ces derniers pouvant être appelés à justifier, devant le juge, du caractère raisonnable de la réduction.

35 La République française considère que la conformité au droit communautaire des dispositions litigieuses est confirmée a contrario par les dispositions de la directive 2007/66. En effet, les directives 89/665 et 92/13 ne contiendraient aucune disposition relative à la durée du délai à respecter par le pouvoir adjudicateur entre la notification des soumissionnaires et la signature du contrat, le délai minimal obligatoire de dix jours n’ayant été institué que par la directive 2007/66. Dès lors, les pouvoirs adjudicateurs ne seraient soumis, jusqu’à l’expiration du délai accordé aux États membres pour la transposition de cette dernière directive, qu’à la règle posée par la Cour dans les arrêts précités Alcatel Austria e.a. ainsi que Commission/Autriche.

36 Il convient de relever d’emblée qu’aucune disposition des directives 89/665 ou 92/13 ne précise un délai que le pouvoir adjudicateur ou l’entité adjudicatrice seraient tenus de respecter entre la notification de la décision d’attribution du marché aux candidats et soumissionnaires évincés et la conclusion du contrat relatif à ce marché.

37 La précision d’un tel délai a été introduite pour la première fois par la directive 2007/66, dans le but exprès de remédier à l’absence de disposition à cet égard dans les directives 89/665 et 92/13, comme cela ressort du quatrième considérant de la directive 2007/66.

38 Par conséquent, contrairement à ce qu’affirme la Commission, l’existence d’un délai minimal de dix jours à respecter entre la notification des candidats et soumissionnaires et la conclusion du marché ne peut pas être déduite des termes des directives 89/665 et 92/13.

39 Les directives 89/665 et 92/13 n’interdisent pas explicitement que le délai à respecter entre la notification de la décision d’attribution du marché aux candidats et soumissionnaires évincés et la signature du contrat soit réduit en cas d’urgence. Il ne découle pas non plus du système et de l’objectif des directives 89/665 et 92/13 que celles-ci interdisent par principe toute réduction dudit délai en cas d’urgence.

40 Cette conclusion est confirmée par le fait que la directive 2007/66 ne prévoit pas de délai de suspension minimal dans les cas d’urgence impérieuse visés aux articles 31, point 1, sous c), de la directive 2004/18 et 40, paragraphe 3, sous d), de la directive 2004/17, comme cela est précisé au huitième considérant de la directive 2007/66.

41 En tenant compte de l’effet utile des directives 89/665 et 92/13, la Cour a précisé qu’un délai raisonnable doit s’écouler entre le moment où la décision d’attribution du marché est notifiée aux soumissionnaires évincés et la conclusion du contrat, afin de permettre à ces derniers, notamment, d’introduire une demande de mesures provisoires jusqu’à ladite conclusion (arrêts Commission/Autriche, précité, point 23, et du 3 avril 2008, Commission/Espagne, C-444/06, Rec. p. I-2045, point 39).

42 Selon les termes des dispositions litigieuses, le délai de suspension visé par celles-ci ne peut être réduit, en cas d’urgence, que «dans des proportions adaptées à la situation».

44 Les dispositions litigieuses prévoient, en substance, que, en effectuant une réduction du délai de recours en cas d'urgence, le pouvoir adjudicateur ou l'entité adjudicatrice doivent néanmoins laisser un délai raisonnable aux opérateurs évincés pour leur permettre de présenter un recours.

45 Dans ces conditions, la Commission n'a pas démontré que les dispositions litigieuses portent atteinte aux exigences des directives 89/665 et 92/13.

46 Dès lors, il y a lieu de rejeter le premier grief de la Commission.

Sur le second grief

47 La Commission fait valoir que l'article 1441-1 du code de procédure civile, dans la mesure où il instaure une phase préalable de mise en demeure obligatoire et non suspensive du délai à respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux candidats et soumissionnaires évincés et la signature du marché, revient à priver ce délai de tout effet utile.

48 Le délai de dix jours prévu audit article 1441-1 pour répondre à la mise en demeure ne serait pas conforme aux directives 89/665 et 92/13, dans la mesure où il interdit tout référé précontractuel avant cette réponse et court en même temps que le délai de suspension de la signature du marché, qui est, lui aussi, de dix jours. Il en résulterait l'impossibilité pour les candidats et soumissionnaires évincés de faire usage du référé précontractuel dans les cas où la réponse ou l'absence de réponse ne serait connue qu'à la date de l'expiration de ce délai de dix jours et où le contrat serait signé à cette date.

49 La République française rappelle que les articles 1er, paragraphe 3, des directives 89/665 et 92/13 permettent aux États membres d'exiger qu'une personne qui souhaite introduire un recours informe préalablement le pouvoir adjudicateur ou l'entité adjudicatrice de la violation alléguée et de son intention d'introduire un recours. En revanche, ces dispositions ne prévoiraient pas qu'une telle information préalable doit avoir un effet suspensif.

52 Les articles 1er, paragraphe 3, des directives 89/665 et 92/13 autorisent les États membres à exiger qu'une personne souhaitant introduire un recours contre un pouvoir adjudicateur ou une entité adjudicatrice informe préalablement ceux-ci de la violation alléguée et de son intention d'introduire un recours, sans prévoir qu'une telle démarche a un effet suspensif.

53 Il n'est pas contesté que l'article 1441-1 du code de procédure civile est conforme auxdites dispositions dans la mesure où il prévoit que le candidat ou soumissionnaire auquel a été notifié le rejet de sa candidature ou de son offre doit, s'il entend introduire un référé précontractuel, préalablement mettre en demeure le pouvoir adjudicateur ou l'entité adjudicatrice.

54 La Commission critique l'article 1441-1 du code de procédure civile dans la mesure seulement où il assortit cette mise en demeure obligatoire d'un délai de réponse de dix jours pendant lequel le délai, également fixé à dix jours, que le pouvoir adjudicateur ou l'entité adjudicatrice sont tenus de respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux candidats et soumissionnaires évincés et la conclusion du contrat n'est pas suspendu. Selon la Commission, cette réglementation a pour effet de priver ce dernier délai de son effet utile.

55 Il convient de constater que, tout en prévoyant un délai de dix jours pour répondre à une mise en demeure, l'article 1441-1 du code de procédure civile exclut tout référé précontractuel avant que n'intervienne la réponse à cette mise en demeure et que ce délai court en même temps que le délai de suspension de la signature du contrat prévu par la législation française, délai qui est lui aussi de dix jours. Il en résulte l'impossibilité pour les candidats et soumissionnaires évincés d'introduire un référé précontractuel dans les cas où, d'une part, la réponse à la mise en demeure n'est donnée qu'après l'expiration dudit délai de dix jours et où, d'autre part, le contrat a été signé entre-temps.

58 Contrairement à ce que fait valoir la République française, la possibilité de présenter une demande de référé précontractuel n'est pas suffisamment garantie par l'existence d'un contrôle juridictionnel a posteriori. L'effet utile des directives 89/665 et 92/13 est mis en cause dès lors que le seul recours possible est celui devant les juges du fond. En effet, dans le cas où le contrat a déjà été signé, le fait que le seul contrôle juridictionnel prévu soit un contrôle a posteriori revient à exclure la possibilité d'introduire un recours à un stade où les violations peuvent encore être corrigées, conformément à la jurisprudence de la Cour (voir arrêt Alcatel Austria e.a., précité, point 38).

59 Dans ces conditions, il y a lieu de conclure que le second grief est fondé.

60 Par conséquent, il convient de constater que, en adoptant et en maintenant en vigueur l'article 1441-1 du code de procédure civile, dans la mesure où cette disposition prévoit, pour la réponse du pouvoir adjudicateur ou de l'entité adjudicatrice à une mise en demeure, un délai de dix jours excluant tout référé précontractuel avant ladite réponse et sans que ce délai suspende le délai à respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux candidats et soumissionnaires évincés et la signature du contrat, la République française a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu des directives 89/665 et 92/13.

Sur les dépens

61 En vertu de l'article 69, paragraphe 3, du règlement de procédure, la Cour peut répartir les dépens ou décider que chaque partie supporte ses propres dépens si les parties succombent respectivement sur un ou plusieurs chefs. La Commission et la République française ayant chacune succombé en l'un des griefs faisant l'objet du présent recours, il convient de condamner chaque partie à supporter ses propres dépens.

Par ces motifs, la Cour (troisième chambre) déclare et arrête:

1) En adoptant et en maintenant en vigueur l'article 1441-1 du nouveau code de procédure civile, tel que modifié par l'article 48-1° du décret n° 2005-1308, du 20 octobre 2005, relatif aux marchés passés par les entités adjudicatrices mentionnées à l'article 4 de l'ordonnance n° 2005-649 du 6 juin 2005 relative aux marchés passés par certaines personnes publiques ou privées non soumises au code des marchés publics, dans la mesure où cette disposition prévoit, pour la réponse du pouvoir adjudicateur ou de l'entité adjudicatrice à une mise en demeure, un délai de dix jours excluant tout référé précontractuel avant ladite réponse et sans que ce délai suspende le délai à respecter entre la notification de la décision d'attribution du marché aux candidats et soumissionnaires évincés et la signature du contrat, la République française a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu des directives 89/665/CEE du Conseil, du 21 décembre 1989, portant coordination des dispositions législatives, réglementaires et administratives relatives à l'application des procédures de recours en matière de passation des marchés publics de fournitures et de travaux, telle que modifiée par la directive 92/50/CEE du Conseil, du 18 juin 1992, et 92/13/CEE du Conseil, du 25 février 1992, portant coordination des dispositions législatives, réglementaires et administratives relatives à l'application des règles communautaires sur les procédures de passation des marchés des entités opérant dans les secteurs de l'eau, de l'énergie, des transports et des télécommunications.

2) Le recours est rejeté pour le surplus.

3) La Commission des Communautés européennes et la République française supportent chacune leurs propres dépens.

having regard to the written procedure and further to the hearing on 6 May 2010, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 16 September 2010,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By its action, the European Commission seeks a declaration that by awarding ‘integrated action programmes’ (‘IAPs’) pursuant, successively, to Law 6/1994 of 15 November 1994 regulating urban development activities in the Valencian Community (Ley 6/1994, de 15 de noviembre, Reguladora de la Actividad Urbanística de la Communidad Valenciana (‘the LRAU’)) and to Valencian Urban Development Law 16/2005 of 30 December 2005 (Ley 16/2005, de 30 de diciembre, Urbanística Valenciana (‘the LUV’)), the Kingdom of Spain has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54), as amended by Commission Directive 2001/78/EC of 13 September 2001 (OJ 2001 L 285, p. 1; ‘Directive 93/37’), and under Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114), respectively.

Legal context

European Union legislation

Directive 92/50/EEC

2 The 16th recital in the preamble to Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1) states:

‘… public service contracts, particularly in the field of property management, may from time to time include some works; … it results from Directive 71/305/EEC that, for a contract to be a public works contract, its object must be the achievement of a work; …, in so far as these works are incidental rather than the object of the contract, they do not justify treating the contract as a public works contract’.

3 Article 8 of Directive 92/50 provides:

‘Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex IA shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI.’

4 Category No 12 in Annex IA to Directive 92/50 mentions, among others, ‘[a]rchitectural services; engineering services and integrated engineering services; urban planning and landscape architectural services; related scientific and technical consulting services; technical testing and analysis services’.

Directive 93/37

5 Article 1 of Directive 93/37 provides:

‘For the purpose of this Directive:

(a) “public works contracts” are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority as defined in (b), which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work defined in (c) below, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority;

(c) a “work” means the outcome of building or civil engineering works taken as a whole that is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic and technical function;

(d) “public works concession” is a contract of the same type as that indicated in (a) except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the construction or in this right together with payment;

6 Article 6(6) of Directive 93/37 requires contracting authorities to observe the principle of non-discrimination.

7 Articles 11 and 12 of Directive 93/37 set forth the common advertising rules and provide, in particular, for the publication in full of contract notices in the Official Journal of the European Communities and the time-limits for the receipt of tenders and for the dispatch of the contract documents and additional information.

8 Articles 24 to 29 of Directive 93/37 lay down the qualitative selection criteria applicable to contractors among which are criteria concerning the evaluation of the technical abilities of contractors.

9 Recital 10 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 is in the following terms:

‘A contract shall be deemed to be a public works contract only if its subject-matter specifically covers the execution of activities listed in Annex I, even if the contract covers the provision of other services necessary for the execution of such activities. Public service contracts, in particular in the sphere of property management services, may, in certain circumstances, include works. However, in so far as such works are incidental to the principal subject-matter of the contract, and are a possible consequence thereof or a complement thereto, the fact that such works are included in the contract does not justify the qualification of the contract as a public works contract.’

10 Article 1 of Directive 2004/18 provides:

‘1. For the purposes of this Directive, the definitions set out in paragraphs 2 to 15 shall apply.

2(a) “Public contracts” are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive.

(b) “Public works contracts” are public contracts having as their object either the execution, or both the design and execution, of works related to one of the activities within the meaning of Annex I or a work, or the realisation, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority. A “work” means the outcome of building or civil engineering works taken as a whole which is sufficient of itself to fulfil an economic or technical function.

(d) “Public service contracts” are public contracts other than public works or supply contracts having as their object the provision of services referred to in Annex II.

3. “Public works concession” is a contract of the same type as a public works contract except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment.

4. “Service concession” is a contract of the same type as a public service contract except for the fact that the consideration for the provision of services consists either solely in the right to exploit the service or in this right together with payment.

11 Article 2 of Directive 2004/18 requires contracting authorities to observe the principles of non-discrimination, equal treatment and transparency.

12 Article 6 of Directive 2004/18 prohibits the disclosure of information which economic operators have forwarded to contracting authorities confidentially.

13 Article 17 of Directive 2004/18 provides that ‘[w]ithout prejudice to the application of Article 3, this Directive shall not apply to service concessions as defined in Article 1(4)’.

14 Article 24 of Directive 2004/18 lays down the rules applicable to the submission of variants by tenderers where the criterion for award is that of the most economically advantageous tender.

15 Article 53 of Directive 2004/18 sets out the contract award criteria and requires the contracting authority to specify, where the award is made to the most economically advantageous tender, the relative weighting which it gives to each of the criteria chosen.

16 Category No 12 in Annex IIA to Directive 2004/18 mentions, among others, ‘[a]rchitectural services; engineering services and integrated engineering services; urban planning and landscape architectural services; related scientific and technical consulting services; technical testing and analysis services’.

Legislation of the Autonomous Community of Valencia

IAPs

17 The LRAU and the LUV provide for two regimes for implementing urban planning, namely isolated action, in cases of single parcels of land involving their being built upon, and integrated action, which covers joint development of two or more parcels in accordance with a single programme converting those parcels into plots for construction (Article 6(2) and (3) of the LRAU and Articles 14 and 15 of the LUV).

18 The IAP is the planning instrument which governs the implementation of integrated action (Article 12G of the LRAU and Article 39(a) of the LUV). Its purpose is to determine the scope of the integrated action and the works which are to be executed, to fix the time-limits applicable, to establish the technical and financial conditions governing its management, to regulate the undertakings and obligations of the agent of urban development ('the developer') by defining its relations with the owners concerned and with the administration and to determine the guarantees to ensure the observance of those obligations and the penalties applicable (Article 29(2) of the LRAU and Article 117(1) of the LUV).

19 In particular, IAPs must make specific provision to attain the following necessary objectives: urban development of all the plots; connection of the plots concerned to and their integration with the existing infrastructure, energy, communications and public services networks; obtaining, for the administration free of charge, plots for public services; obtaining, for the administration free of charge, the legally applicable right to build for the public land bank; management of the legal conversion of the plots concerned and the equitable division of the costs and benefits between the parties concerned (Article 30 of the LRAU and Article 124 of the LUV).

20 Although the implementation of isolated action may be public or private, that of IAPs is always public, and the administration is entitled to decide whether their management will be direct or indirect (Article 7(1) and (2) of the LRAU and Article 117(4) of the LUV). Management is direct when all the works and investments are financed by public funds and managed by the administration, its bodies, entities, or public undertakings (Article 7(2) of the LRAU and Article 117(4) of the LUV) without the right to receive any commercial profit (Article 128(4) of the LUV). On the other hand, in cases of indirect management, the administration delegates the status of developer to an individual, whether or not he is the owner of the plots, selected by a competitive public tendering procedure (Article 7(2) of the LRAU and Article 117(4) of the LUV).

Indirect management

21 Within the framework of indirect management of IAPs, the developer is the public agent responsible for the development and for the execution of the urban planning activities designated by the IAP, which include, in any event, the preparation of the technical documents established in the bases, the proposal for and management of the corresponding land consolidation project, as well as the recourse to the building contractor responsible for the implementation of the planning project, in the cases and according to the conditions laid down by law. The developer will have to finance the cost of the investments, works, installations, and compensation necessary for the execution of the programme, which will have to be guaranteed in and according to sufficient proportions, the cost of which can be passed on to the ownership of the building plots arising therefrom either by compensation in developed plots or by payment in cash by the owners of the developed plots resulting from the integrated action (Article 29(9A) of the LRAU and Articles 19 and 162(1) of the LUV). Those costs include, in particular, the costs of the urban development works and the developer's commercial profit, which is limited, under the LUV, to 10% of the development costs (Article 67(1) of the LRAU and Article 168 of the LUV).

22 The owners concerned by integrated action may cooperate in it, by contributing their undeveloped plots and receiving, in exchange, developed plots. They may, in particular, either participate proportionally in the development costs by granting a part of their plots to the developer, or by paying in cash, as consideration to the developer, their proportion of the development costs (Article 29(9B) of the LRAU and Article 162(2) of the LUV).

23 Owners who expressly decline to cooperate may seek expropriation on the basis of the original value of the plots concerned (Article 29(9C) of the LRAU and Article 162(3) of the LUV).

24 The administration exercises, of its own motion or at the developer's request, its public rights and powers such as expropriation or compulsory consolidation where they are necessary to implement an IAP (Articles 29(10), 66 and 68 of the LRAU and Articles 162(3) and 169 of the LUV).

The award and approval procedure

– The LRAU

25 Under Article 44 of the LRAU, the procedure may be commenced on the initiative of a public body or of an individual, whether or not he owns the plots to be developed.

26 Under Article 45(1) of the LRAU, any individual may request the administration to make public a technical tender for an IAP which must contain a copy of the development certificate issued by the competent administration or of its request covering the minimum conditions for connection and integration of the proposal for integrated action, as well as the preliminary draft of the development with descriptions of the development works to be carried out.

27 Under the terms of Article 45(2) of the LRAU, the administration may either reject that request or submit it to a public inquiry, if appropriate with observations or alternatives.

28 Article 46 of the LRAU provides that publication of the proposal for an IAP drawn up by an individual or, in the case of a public initiative, by the competent administration, is to be in a general information journal and in the Official Journal of the Autonomous Community of Valencia. In accordance with the same provision, during the public information phase, observations or technical tenders are accepted. At the conclusion of the public information phase, tenderers may submit legal and financial tenders. Observations and technical tenders are to be submitted, in open envelopes, within a period of 20 days from the publication of the proposal for the IAP and legal and financial tenders, in closed envelopes, within five days following the expiry of the previous period, which may be extended by 20 days.

29 Article 46(2) of the LRAU mentions the documents which are to form part, first, of the technical tender, namely, in particular, the description of the development works, and, second, of the legal and financial tender including the detailed rules concerning relations between the developer and the owners, any agreements already existing with the latter, an estimate, even if preliminary and approximate, of the costs of the development works and the developer's consideration with reference to correction indices in relation to the estimate of the costs of the development works.

30 Under Article 47 of the LRAU, the administration may either reject all the tenders and, if appropriate, decide to manage the IAP directly, or approve the IAP defining its content by the selection of a technical tender and a legal and financial tender from those submitted, making the partial amendments to them which it considers expedient. Concurrently, the administration may award the IAP to the tenderer of a legal and financial tender relating to the most appropriate technical tender. That award is to be made according to the award criteria which are mentioned in it, including the guarantees or possibilities of collaboration of the owners concerned to facilitate or ensure the implementation of the integrated action.

31 The administration and the developer are to execute an urban development agreement containing, in accordance with Article 32(c) of the LRAU, their respective undertakings, the time-limits, the guarantees provided by the developer, as well as the penalties laid down for the developer's breach of its obligations.

32 Article 48 of the LRAU provides for a simplified procedure on the initiative of an individual.

33 Under Article 67(3) of the LRAU, the costs initially provided for in the IAP may be re-evaluated during the approval of the development project for objective reasons which were not foreseeable by the developer.

– The LUV

34 Under Article 130 of the LUV, the procedure for the award and approval of an IAP may be commenced on the initiative of a public body or of an individual, whether or not they are owners of the plots.

35 Under Article 130(2) of the LUV, individuals may accompany their request with a planning document specifying the detailed or structural arrangement of the development which is proposed as well as documents referred to in Article 131(2)(a) to (e) of the LUV.

36 Under Article 130(3) of the LUV, the administration may reject the individual's request, commence the procedure for indirect management, or decide to have recourse to direct management.

37 Under the terms of Article 130(5) of the LUV, the administration's failure to respond is taken to be agreement, if the tender submitted by the first tenderer involves execution of the structural planning directives in force and the administration does not reply to the request within a period of three months.

38 Under Article 131(2) of the LUV, the decision to commence the procedure for indirect management of an IAP also implies approval of the particular specifications governing the procedure for the award of the IAP. They must state whether variants are accepted, define the aspects for which tenderers may propose variants and lay down the minimum conditions which they must fulfil.

39 According to the terms of Article 132(2) and (4) of the LUV, the public competition for the award of an IAP must be published, at least, in the Official Journal of the European Union and in the Official Journal of the Autonomous Community of Valencia, irrespective of the IAP's estimated value.

40 Under Article 133 of the LUV, tenderers' tenders are to contain the documents relating to the capacities required, to the technical tender and to the legal and financial tender.

41 The criteria for evaluating the technical and professional capacity of tenderers are set out in Article 123 of the LUV.

42 The content of the technical tender is specified in Article 126 of the LUV.

43 The content of the legal and financial tender is, for its part, specified in Article 127 of the LUV, under which it must contain terms governing relations between the developer and the owners concerned and, in particular, the detailed rules concerning the consideration for it as well as sufficient information to enable the owners to ascertain the financial consequences which the tender in question involves for them. The financial and legal tender must establish, in particular, the expected development costs, the developer's profit and the exchange coefficient applicable in case of payment in plots.

44 Article 135(3) of the LUV sets out the criteria for the award of the IAP which will have to be evaluated as regards the technical tender.

45 Article 135(4) of the LUV sets out the criteria for the award of the IAP which will have to be evaluated as regards the legal and financial tender, particularly the amount of the development costs as well as the lowest proportion of building plots or rights to build made available to the developer by compulsory consolidation or the highest proportion of its own or its associates' plots which must be used to comply with the special obligations to build arising from approval of the IAP.

46 Article 137 of the LUV contains provisions applicable to the award and approval of the IAP. Under Article 137(5) of the LUV, if the IAP amends structural planning, approval by the administration is conditional on the final authorisation of the regional government.

47 Article 138 of the LUV requires the contract with the developer to be executed in the form of an administrative document within a month following the date of the award of the contract. That article lists the matters which must be included in the contract.

48 Under Article 143(4)(d) of the LUV, in the event of termination of the contract with the developer, the administration may request tenderers who submitted legal and financial tenders relating to the technical tender which was accepted to pursue the execution of the programme, and, alternatively, launch a call for tenders on the basis of the technical tender accepted at the conclusion of the first call for tenders.

49 Under Article 155(6) and (7) of the LUV, the administration may make amendments to the development project contained in the tender accepted on the award of an IAP where the changes thus made represent an increase not exceeding 20% of the cost of the development works.

50 According to Article 168(3) of the LUV, the maximum amount of the development costs may not be increased unless they are re-evaluated, which may not involve an increase of the part of the development costs corresponding to the developer's profit.

51 As regards the execution of the development works, the LUV requires that it be entrusted to a building contractor selected by the developer within the framework of a public competition, in accordance with the rules for the award of public contracts. Neither the developer concerned nor undertakings linked to it may participate in that public competition.

52 Under the first transitional provision of the LUV, IAPs commenced before its entry into force, which was on 1 February 2006, are governed by the LRAU provided that, before that date, they were the object of municipal approval or the maximum period for making an express decision on that approval had expired.

The pre-litigation procedure and the Commission's action

53 Following complaints, the Commission, by a letter of formal notice of 21 March 2005, informed the Kingdom of Spain that several provisions of the LRAU relating to the award of IAPs were, in its view, contrary to Directives 93/37 and 92/50. The Kingdom of Spain replied to that letter of formal notice by a letter of 31 March 2005, claiming that the award of IAPs did not constitute a contract governed by those directives. It referred, also, to the draft adoption of the LUV, which also gave rise to contacts and an exchange of letters between it and the Commission.

54 Since it was not satisfied by the Kingdom of Spain's explanations and since it considered the award of IAPs under the LRAU constituted a failure to fulfil its obligation under those directives, the Commission, on 15 December 2005, issued a reasoned opinion with which that Member State had to comply within a period of three weeks expiring on 6 January 2006.

55 In its reply dated 26 January 2006 to the reasoned opinion, the Kingdom of Spain referred to the adoption of the LUV repealing the LRAU, the entry into force of the LUV being envisaged for 1 February 2006. Following exchanges with the Commission, that Member State, by letter of 17 March 2006, made some additional observations.

56 In the light of the persistence of the alleged infringement and the expiry of the time-limit laid down for the transposition of Directive 2004/18, the Commission, on 10 April 2006, sent the Kingdom of Spain an additional letter of formal notice to which the latter replied by letter of 7 July 2006.

57 Since it considered, first, that the LUV and, second, the award of IAPs under the LRAU between 21 March 2005 and 31 January 2006 constituted breach, in particular, of Directive 2004/18, the Commission issued an additional reasoned opinion dated 12 October 2006.

58 Since the Kingdom of Spain maintained its position in its reply, dated 11 January 2007, to the additional reasoned opinion, the Commission brought the present action, seeking from the Court a declaration that the Kingdom of Spain has:

– by awarding IAPs pursuant to the LRAU, failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 1, 6(6), 11, 12 and 24 to 29 of Directive 93/37; and – by awarding IAPs pursuant to the LUV, failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2, 6, 24, 30, 31(4)(a) and 53 of Directive 2004/18.

The application to reopen the oral procedure

59 By letter dated 22 November 2010, the Commission requested that the oral procedure be reopened, submitting, in essence, that the issue of the competent administration's financial participation, as analysed by the Advocate General in his Opinion, constitutes an essential element of the dispute and requires additional clarification.

60 In that regard, it is appropriate to note that the Court may of its own motion, or on a proposal from the Advocate General, or at the request of the parties, order the reopening of the oral procedure in accordance with Article 61 of the Rules of Procedure if it considers that it lacks sufficient information, or that the case must be dealt with on the basis of an argument which has not been debated between the parties (see, in particular, Case C-42/07 Liga Portuguesa de Futebol Profissional and Bwin International [2009] ECR I-7633, paragraph 31 and the case-law cited).

61 However, neither the Statute of the Court of Justice of the European Union nor its Rules of Procedure make provision for the parties to submit observations in response to the Advocate General's Opinion (see Liga Portuguesa de Futebol Profissional and Bwin International, paragraph 32).

62 The Court considers, having heard the Advocate General, that it has all the material necessary for it to decide the dispute before it and that the case does not have to be examined in the light of arguments that have not been the subject of discussion before it. Therefore, there is no need to order the reopening of the oral procedure.

Admissibility

63 The Kingdom of Spain raises the partial inadmissibility of the action so far as it concerns breach of Directive 93/37 by the LRAU. In that regard, the Kingdom of Spain considers that the fact that the first reasoned opinion could require that the LRAU be adapted to Directive 93/37 instead of referring to Directive 2004/18, the time-limit for the transposition of which into domestic law was on the point of expiring, can be criticised.

64 In the Kingdom of Spain's submission, the LRAU ceased to be applied on the entry into force of the LUV and the Commission has not established the approval of a significant number of IAPs under the LRAU during the period prior to the LUV coming into effect. Furthermore, the Kingdom of Spain submits that, where national and Community legislation was repealed, as in this case, more than two years before the bringing of proceedings, there is no longer any point in pursuing the proceedings.

65 In that respect, it is with regard to the legislation in force on 6 January 2006, the date on which the period prescribed in the first reasoned opinion of 15 December 2005 expired, that it must be decided whether the alleged infringement occurred. On that date both the LRAU and Directive 93/37 were in force.

66 As regards the time at which the Commission chose to bring the proceedings against the Kingdom of Spain, it is sufficient to observe that it is for the Commission, in performing the task conferred upon it by Article 211 EC, to ensure that the provisions of the Treaty are applied and verify whether the Member States have acted in accordance with those provisions. If the Commission considers that a Member State has infringed provisions of the Treaty, it is for it to determine whether it is expedient to take action against that State and what provisions the State has infringed, and to choose the time at which it will initiate infringement proceedings; the considerations which determine its choice of time cannot affect the admissibility of its action (see Case C-35/96 Commission v Italy [1998] ECR I-3851, paragraph 27; Case C-33/04 Commission v Luxembourg [2005] ECR I-10629, paragraph 66; and Case C-531/06 Commission v Italy [2009] ECR I-4103, paragraph 23).

67 In the light of the foregoing, the plea of inadmissibility submitted by the Kingdom of Spain must be rejected.

Substance

Arguments of the parties

68 The Commission submits that several aspects of the procedure for awarding and approving IAPs in indirect management under the LRAU and the LUV are, respectively, contrary to Articles 1, 6(6), 11, 12 and 24 to 29 of Directive 93/37 and to Articles 2, 6, 24, 30, 31(4)(a) and 53 of Directive 2004/18.

69 The Commission submits that the relationship between the administration and the developer constitutes, under Directives 93/37 and 2004/18, a public contract the principal object of which, as is clear from the description of integrated action, is the execution of public infrastructure and urban development works.

70 The fact that the physical execution of those works must, within the framework of the LUV, be entrusted by the developer to a building contractor does not in the least alter the classification of the contract as a works contract since it is the developer which undertakes to the administration to carry them out.

71 As regards the pecuniary interest of the award and the approval of IAPs, the Commission observes that the LRAU and the LUV put in place a system in which there is a bilateral contract between the developer and the local authority under which the consideration moving to the local authority relates directly to the execution of public works and the supply of certain connected services. In addition, the developer receives from the landowners a sum of money or its equivalent in plots.

72 The Commission submits that the pecuniary interest of the contract finds expression in the administration's decision to approve the IAP and to select the developer as well as in its exercise of its public rights and powers to guarantee compliance with the provisions of the approved IAP.

73 The Commission adds that, if the administration decides to manage the IAP directly, it must carry out the projects itself and expend the sums necessary for the works. In that case, it incurs costs which it then passes on to the owners whereas, if it opts for indirect management, the administration expends nothing, but nor does it receive anything. The Commission concludes that, by opting for indirect management, the administration ceases entirely to receive certain monies, and the fact that it also does not bear certain expenses in no way qualifies that statement.

74 Lastly, the Commission submits, as is clear particularly from Case C-399/98 Ordine degli Architetti and Others [2001] ECR I-5409, paragraphs 77 and 84, and Case C-220/05 Auroux and Others [2007] ECR I-385, paragraphs 45 and 57, that payments by third parties are indicative of pecuniary interest.

75 In its reply, the Commission observes that the Tribunal Supremo (Supreme Court, Spain) has made an interpretation which is diametrically opposed to that maintained in this case by the Kingdom of Spain and which essentially mirrors the Commission's analysis.

76 The Kingdom of Spain submits, for its part, that the relationship between the administration and the developer constitutes, having regard to the method of remunerating the developer, not a public works contract but a public service concession which does not come within the scope of Directives 93/37 and 2004/18, and that, therefore, the award of IAPs is subject to the principles of primary European Union law.

77 The Kingdom of Spain submits that the Commission is confusing IAPs with planning projects, when the execution of public works does not constitute the exclusive, or even fundamental, purpose of IAPs. Approval of an IAP, by means of an award, also involves the financing and management of land consolidation as well as the assignment of development works to service providers. The developer is therefore also financially responsible for the execution of the works and is liable to carry out the necessary administrative procedures in order to guarantee that the operations are free of charge for the administration and that the land-related costs and profits from them are fairly divided between the owners.

78 The Kingdom of Spain also contends that there is no pecuniary interest bearing on the administration since the developer's remuneration is provided exclusively by the owners.

79 First of all, the owner's obligation to finance the costs of planning and, therefore, to remunerate the developer does not arise from a unilateral decision of the administration, but from its voluntary decision to participate in the land consolidation and thus to obtain the benefit of new plots for building.

80 Next, the LRAU and the LUV do not provide for any guarantee of payment from public funds from which a contract for consideration arises between the administration and the developer, which is responsible to the administration even if the building contractor or the owners do not comply with their respective obligations.

81 Finally, the choice of indirect management in place of direct management does not involve consideration, any more than the exercise by the administration of its public rights and powers for the purposes of land consolidation or expropriation.

82 In the light of those considerations, the Kingdom of Spain contends that the developer must be regarded not as a 'successful tenderer' for a contract in the strict sense, but as a 'concessionaire', since the developer's remuneration depends on the exploitation on the market of building plots and not on a fixed price guaranteed by the administration. In particular, it assumes the characteristics of a service concessionaire, since the financial management of the land consolidation is the most relevant function from the economic point of view.

83 The Kingdom of Spain contends, also, that the Commission's argument is contrary to the effectiveness of Directives 93/37 and 2004/18.

Findings of the Court

84 As a preliminary point, it should be noted that the present action relates only to the award of contracts for urban development under laws adopted successively by the Autonomous Community of Valencia on the basis of its regional powers in respect of urban development, land use and town and country planning.

85 More particularly, the Commission criticises the Kingdom of Spain for awarding IAPs, that is to say integrated action programmes for the joint urban development of several parcels in accordance with a single programme converting those parcels into building plots, pursuant, first, to the LRAU and, second, to the LUV, in breach of Directives 93/37 and 2004/18 respectively.

86 The Commission's complaints concern only the procedure for approving IAPs in indirect management, which, under the legislation in question, involves the delegation, by the competent contracting authority to an individual, of the status of developer, selected according to a competitive public procedure whether or not the developer owns the plots concerned.

87 In that regard, the Commission submits that the urban development contracts in question must be classified as 'public works contracts' and must on that basis comply with the requirements laid down by Directive 93/37 and, later, Directive 2004/18. That follows, as regards the complaints in respect of the LRAU, from the legal basis of the action limited to breach of Directive 93/37 alone and, as regards the complaints in respect of the LUV, from the additional reasoned opinion, as the Commission notes in its application and as it confirmed at the hearing.

88 As regards the concept of 'public works contracts' within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Directive 93/37 and of Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, it must be observed that it covers contracts for pecuniary interest, concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object either the execution, or both the design and execution, of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II to Directive 93/37 or Annex I to Directive 2004/18 or of a work defined in Article 1(c) of Directive 93/37 or Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority.

89 In addition, it is clear from the 16th recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50 and from recital 10 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18, in conjunction with Article 1(a) of Directive 93/37 and Article 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18 respectively, that a contract can be deemed to be a 'public works contract' only if its subject-matter corresponds to the definition given in the preceding paragraph and that works which are incidental to, and not the subject-matter of, the contract do not justify the contract's qualification as a public works contract.

90 It is clear, moreover, from the case-law of the Court that, where a contract contains elements relating both to a public works contract and another type of contract, it is the main object of the contract which determines which body of European Union rules on public contracts is to be applied in principle (see, to that effect, Auroux and Others, paragraph 37).

91 That determination must be made in the light of the essential obligations which predominate and which, as such, characterise the transaction, as opposed to those which are only ancillary or supplementary in nature and are required by the very object of the contract (Case C-412/04 Commission v Italy [2008] ECR I-619, paragraph 49).

92 In this case, it must be observed that the Commission confines itself to putting forward the argument that the urban development contracts at issue must be classified as 'public works contracts' on the ground that the main object of IAPs is, for the purposes of Articles 1(c) of Directive 93/37 and 1(2)(b) of Directive 2004/18, a 'work' of urban development of two or more parcels leading to the construction of highway access by a paved road, the distribution of drinking water and electricity, the evacuation of waste water from gutters and public lighting. In that regard, the Commission observes that the services provided by the developer, such as the preparation of technical documents, the drawing-up and management of the development project or even, under the LUV, the selection of the contractor which will carry out the works, are instrumental and ancillary.

93 It is also appropriate to observe that the Kingdom of Spain rejects the Commission's assessment that IAPs should be classified as a 'work', in the sense of Directives 93/37 and 2004/18, and contends that the execution of such a work does not constitute its exclusive or even fundamental purpose. To that effect, that Member State contends that the developer is also financially liable for the execution of the works and is likewise responsible for taking the necessary steps to guarantee that the operations are free of charge for the administration, and that the costs relating to them and the corresponding land-related profits are fairly divided between the owners of the building plots who finance them. In addition, that Member State contends that the contracts at issue must be classified as 'service concessions', within the meaning of Article 1(4) of Directive 2004/18.

94 According to settled case-law, in proceedings under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, it is for the Commission to prove that failure. It is the Commission, indeed, which must place before the Court all the information needed to enable the Court to establish that failure, and in so doing the Commission may not rely on any presumptions (Case C-490/09 Commission v Luxembourg [2011] ECR I-0000, paragraph 49 and the case-law cited).

95 In that regard and as regards the nature of the activities for which the developer is responsible, notwithstanding the Kingdom of Spain's analysis, the Commission has not sought to substantiate its own allegations or to refute those of the defendant Member State by detailed examination of that information.

96 Indeed, it has not been established that the works consisting of the connection and integration of the plots concerned to the existing infrastructure, energy, communications and public services networks constitute the main object of the contract concluded between the community and the developer within the framework of an IAP in indirect management. In fact, the execution of the IAP by the developer includes, as is clear particularly from paragraphs 21 and 23 of the present judgment, activities which cannot be classified as 'works', within the meaning of the directives relied on by the Commission in its application, namely the preparation of the development plan, the proposal and management of the corresponding land consolidation project, obtaining for the administration free of charge plots for public ownership and for the community's public land bank, management of the legal conversion of the plots concerned or even the equitable division of the costs and profits between the parties concerned as well as the transactions for financing and guaranteeing the cost of the investments, works, installations and compensation necessary for the execution of the IAP. Such is also the case where the developer, as stated in Article 119(1) of the LUV, must organise the public competition for the appointment of the building contractor to which the execution of the urban development works is to be entrusted.

97 In addition, some of the activities which IAPs involve, under both the LRAU and the LUV as stated in the preceding paragraph, seem to correspond, by their nature, to the activities referred to in Category No 12 in Annexes IA to Directive 92/50 and IIA to Directive 2004/18, relating to the services referred to, respectively, in Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50 and Article 1(2)(d) of Directive 2004/18.

98 It follows that the Commission has not proved that the main object of the contract concluded between the local authority and the developer is a public works contract within the meaning of Directive 93/37 or Directive 2004/18, which is a condition precedent to a declaration of the alleged failure to fulfil obligations.

99 It follows from the foregoing that the Commission's action must be dismissed.

Costs

100 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Kingdom of Spain has applied for costs and the Commission has been unsuccessful, the Commission must be ordered to pay the costs.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby:

1. Dismisses the action;

2. Orders the European Commission to pay the costs.

OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL
JÄÄSKINEN
delivered on 16 September 2010 (1)

Case C-306/08

European Commission
Kingdom of Spain

(Infringement proceedings – Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations – Directive 93/37/EEC – Directive 2004/18/EC – Public works contracts – Public service contracts – Public service concession – Public works concession – Land development – Urban planning and development laws in the Valencia region)

1. In the present infringement action the Commission requests the Court to hold that in awarding the Integrated Action Programmes ('IAPs'), an urban development measure in the region of Valencia, established by the LRAU (2) and its successor the LUV, (3) Spain has failed to fulfil its obligations in respect of public procurement Directives 93/37/EEC (4) and 2004/18/EC. (5)

2. This action enables the Court to consider once again the treatment of urban development measures within the scope of the public procurement rules, as well as to further clarify the meaning of 'pecuniary interest' and 'concessions' in the public procurement directives in question.

3. The present infringement action has been the result of a large number of petitions to the European Parliament, complaining about various aspects of the LRAU including the geographical location of the development projects and their impact on the environment, the expropriation of land without fair compensation, and the obligation of landowners to pay for infrastructure works they did not want or need. (6) The Commission investigated the various objections and found that the only avenue that could be pursued was the public procurement one since the Commission either did not have the competence, (7) or because the legal case was not strong. (8) Since the main grievances of the petitioners concerned issues other than compliance with the public procurement rules, (9) the Commission's present action and the outcome of the case will do little to console them.

I – Legal framework

A – EU law (10)

1. Directive 93/37

4. Directive 93/37 applies to public works contracts and concessions.

5. Public works contracts are defined as 'contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contractor and a contracting authority…which have as their object either the execution, or both the execution and design of works related to one of the activities referred to in Annex II or a work … or the execution, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority'. (11)

6. Public works concessions are defined as ‘a contract of the same type as that indicated in (a) except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the construction or in this right together with payment’. (12)

7. Article 6(6) contains a general non-discrimination requirement.

8. Article 11 requires notices to be published in full in the Official Journal of the European Communities and in the TED data bank.

9. Article 12 concerns the time-limits for the receipt of tenders. It provides for a period of 52 days from the publication of the notice in cases where the open procedure is used.

10. Chapter II of Title IV, that is, Articles 24 to 29, concerns the criteria for qualitative selection. Article 24 lists situations when a contractor may be excluded from participation in a contract, and includes things such as a contractor who is bankrupt or has been convicted of an offence concerning professional conduct. Articles 25 to 29 deal with evidence that may be asked of a contractor concerning his enrolment in the professional or trade register, financial standing, technical capability, as well as addressing the situation of Member States who have official lists of recognised contractors.

2. Directive 2004/18

11. Directive 2004/18 recast, amongst others, Directive 93/37. The former covers all public contracts, defined as ‘contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this directive’. (13)

12. Public works contracts are further defined as ‘public contracts having as their object either the execution, or both the design and execution, of works related to one of the activities within the meaning of Annex I or a work, or the realisation, by whatever means, of a work corresponding to the requirements specified by the contracting authority’. (14)

13. Public service contracts are further defined as ‘public contracts other than public works or supply contracts having as their object the provision of services referred to in Annex II’. (15)

14. A public works concession is further defined as ‘a contract of the same type as a public works contract except for the fact that the consideration for the works to be carried out consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment’. (16)

15. A service concession is further defined as ‘a contract of the same type as a public service contract except for the fact that the consideration for the provision of services consists either solely in the right to exploit the service or in this right together with payment’, (17) and is excluded from the directive. (18)

16. Directive 2004/18 does not apply to public service contracts for the acquisition or rental by whatever financial means, of land, existing buildings or other immovable property or concerning rights thereon. (19)

17. Article 2 states that in awarding contracts contracting authorities shall treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily, and shall act in a transparent way.

18. Article 6 relates to the confidentiality of technical and trade secrets as well as other confidential aspects of tenders, and requires the contracting authority not to disclose information forwarded to it by economic operators which they have designated as confidential.

19. Article 24 states that contracting authorities shall indicate in the contract notice whether or not they authorise variants and that they shall state in the contract documents the minimum requirements to be met by the variants and any specific requirements for their presentation. Only variants meeting the minimum requirements laid down by these contracting authorities shall be taken into consideration.

20. Article 30 is about cases justifying use of the negotiated procedure with prior publication of a contract notice. It outlines the way in which such negotiated procedures shall be conducted.

21. Article 31(4)(a) deals with cases justifying use of the negotiated procedure without publication of a contract notice and more specifically, in case additional works or services not included in the project initially considered are required, the way in which this must be carried out.

22. Article 48(2) lists evidence that may be provided in order to indicate the economic operator's technical abilities.

23. Article 53 states that the criteria on which the contracting authorities shall base the award of public contracts shall be either that which is the most economically advantageous from the point of view of the contracting authority (which can involve various criteria linked to the subject-matter of the contract in question such as environmental characteristics, quality, price and cost-effectiveness, amongst other things), or that with the lowest price. It also refers to the obligation on the contracting authority to specify, if possible, the relative weighting attached to each criterion to determine the most economically advantageous tender, or the criteria in descending order of importance.

B – National law

1. State legislation

24. In Spain, public procurement belongs to the legislative competence of the State. The State competence also covers expropriation and the right to ownership. On the other hand, planning and land-use belong to the regional legislative remit, within the framework provided by the Constitution and the State law. (20) The LRAU and the LUV have been issued on the basis of the regional competences to regulate the planning, use and development of land.

25. The Spanish Constitution recognises the right to private property and inheritance limited, however, by their social function in accordance with laws. (21) According to it: all persons are entitled to appropriate housing; the public powers contribute to the creation of the necessary conditions for the exercise of this right through adequate regulation of the use of land in the general interest so as to prevent speculation; the community shall benefit from the increase in the value of land following the urban development measures adopted by the public authorities. (22)

26. The Spanish State legislation on planning and land-use has undergone several changes after the adoption of the LRAU, the present legislative framework being incorporated in the TRLS. (23) It is useful to explain certain basic principles of this legislation that were also included in the preceding legislative acts applicable during the pre-litigation period.

27. According to the TRLS, land planning and urban development are non-commercial public services aimed at organising the use of land in accordance with the general interest and fixing the rights and obligations relating to ownership with regard to the objectives ascribed for the use of land. The categorisation of these objectives for each piece of land does not entail a right to compensation unless expressly provided by law. The planning and land-use legislation must ensure that the public authorities regulate and control the land development during its various phases from occupation, through building of infrastructures and building and construction activities, to use by any public or private person. In addition, the community must benefit from the increase of value generated by measures adopted by public authorities. (24)

28. Private parties, landowners and others may, within the framework of free enterprise, execute works relating to urban development when they are not executed by the competent authority. The authorisation to execute such works must be subject to public competitive award procedures that enable the local community to benefit in an appropriate manner as a result of the increase in value generated by the urban development. (25)

29. Actions promoting urban development may require: (1) the free transfer of the areas reserved for streets, green spaces and other communal areas as well as, with certain limits corresponding to building opportunities created by the action, territories reserved for public purposes to the local authority; (2) the financing and execution of all the works relating to the urban development in accordance with the action and to build up the necessary infrastructures; and (3) the transfer of the infrastructures and work, together with the accompanying territories, to the competent authority. (26)

2. Regional legislation

a) Definition of the IAP

30. According to the LRAU and the LUV, urban development (27) in the autonomous region of Valencia can take place according to the isolated action regime (in cases of a single piece of land) or integrated action regime (in cases of two or more pieces of land when there is a need to link the building land to a network of services). (28)

31. Integrated actions are always public, (29) and can be carried out directly or indirectly. The local authority which wishes to develop the land in question by integrated action can choose which of those procedures to engage. (30) If it chooses the direct management procedure the works and investments are financed through public funds (31) and managed by the contracting authority. (32) If it decides on the indirect management procedure the local authority chooses a developer, and the landowners must compensate the developer for the costs of development, proportionally to the land they contribute to the project.

b) IAP procedure

32. One of the ways of carrying out an integrated action is by engaging the IAP procedure. (33) In both the case of the LRAU and the LUV the IAP procedure consists of four steps: initiative, selection, land readjustment and infrastructure provision. (34)

33. The engagement of the IAP procedure can be initiated by the local authority or at anyone's request, whether they own the land concerned or not. (35) A detailed development plan must be approved by the local authority. (36) The IAP entails a definitive choice between the land-use alternatives for the area enabled by the plan in force.

34. Under the LRAU, the IAP procedure is engaged when a request is made to make public a technical alternative for an IAP. (37) This document identifies the area to be developed, indicates the detailed or structural plans to be implemented by the IAP and includes a proposal for land use and its integration to the surrounding areas.(38) The local authority can either reject the demand, or make the information public by publishing it in the regional official journals, (39) with or without observations. (40) During the public consultations anyone can make observations or submit alternative technical offers. At this time financial offers can also be made. (41) The financial offers determine the legal, economic and financial conditions of the IAP. (42) The local authority then approves an IAP by choosing a technical offer and a financial offer (though not necessarily from the same person). (43) Under the LRAU there is also a simplified procedure where the approval by the local authority of the first technical offer presented by the initiator of the IAP is not necessary, formalisation before a notary being the only requirement in such a case. (44)

35. Under the LUV, the IAP is initiated by a person submitting any of the documents listed in the LUV. (45) Those documents become part of the specifications concerning the award of the IAP, (46) upon which subsequent tenders are judged. (47) When the documents are submitted the contracting authority decides whether it will opt for the direct or the indirect management procedure. (48) The choice of an indirect management procedure entails the approval of the specifications in the documents as submitted, (49) either implicitly (50) or explicitly, and the process for the awarding of the IAP begins with the publication of a notice in the Official Journal of the EU as well as in the regional official journals. (51) If the IAP modifies the structural development, the approval of the IAP by the contracting authority is conditional upon the definitive approval by the regional government. (52)

c) The aims of the IAP

36. The aim of the IAP is to identify the scope of the integrated action by defining the works to be carried out, the deadlines, and the technical and economic base for the management of the action. (53)

Its aim is to develop two or more parcels by transforming them into developed land and attaching them to existing service networks. (54)

37. According to both the LRAU and the LUV the IAP must achieve the following: (55)

– attachment of the new (developed) lots to a network of infrastructures, communications and existing public services;

– construction of new infrastructures and public spaces;

– complete development of the space and the carrying out of necessary complementary public works;

– the obtaining of land for the purposes of the IAP;

– the obtaining of a right to develop;

– obtaining the costs necessary to see the IAP through.

38. In addition to these obligations, the regional legislation outlines the following which may also be achieved through the IAP: (56)

– contribution for the benefit of the local authority (57)

– carrying out other works

– construction of social housing.

d) Division of powers pursuant to the IAP

39. The local authority controls and oversees the IAP procedure. It is responsible for choosing a developer in indirect action cases, (58) as well for approving the IAP and suggesting modifications if necessary. (59) At the end of the IAP the works pass to the local authority three months after being formally offered to the local council without receiving a reply, or from the date when they are open to the public. (60) After receipt the local authority assumes the maintenance obligations. The contracting authority may agree to receive a monetary payment instead of the land corresponding to their entitled development profit of 10%. (61)

40. The developer is the local authority in direct action cases, but is chosen by the local authority through public tender in indirect action cases. He is defined in the regional legislation as the public agent responsible for the development and execution of the IAP. (62)

41. The developer is responsible for writing technical documents as required by the specifications, and developing and managing the re-allotment of the land, (63) as well as choosing a sub-contractor to carry out the works. (64) The developer is the person whose financial offer has been approved as a result of the IAP procedure, and he is responsible for implementing the technical offer which has been approved, which might not necessarily have been his own. Under the LUV the developer is obliged to sub-contract in accordance with public procurement rules the execution of public works entailed by the IAP unless the thresholds are not exceeded, if there is only one landowner or, in the case of several landowners, they unanimously agree with the developer that he can himself execute the works. The developer is paid by receiving from the landowners a part of the developed land and/or cash payments. (65)

42. The landowner can choose between expropriation and participation in the IAP. If he chooses expropriation he will receive a price on the basis of the original value of the land concerned. (66) In such a situation the local authority will be responsible for the expropriation and the developer obliged to pay the compensation. (67) If he chooses to participate he will be obliged to pay a proportion of the costs of development either by giving the developer a portion of his land, or by paying him directly in money. (68) In return he receives developed land.

43. The landowner is obliged to pay the following costs, in proportion to the area of the land which he has given to the project: (69)

– costs of development works and indemnities in respect of necessary investment in order to achieve the IAP objectives;

– the developer's profit as a result of the IAP (capped at 10% under the LUV but not under the LRAU);

– the associated management costs.

II – Pre-litigation procedure

44. On 21 March 2005 the Commission sent Spain a letter of formal notice considering that various provisions of the LRAU relating to the attribution of IAPs were contrary to Directive 93/37. The Spanish authorities replied to that letter contesting that the IAP was a public contract within the meaning of the directive, and referring to the proposed adoption of the new law, the LUV.

45. On 15 December 2005, following an exchange of letters between the Commission and the Spanish authorities, and unsatisfied with Spain's replies, the Commission sent a reasoned opinion requesting that Spain take the necessary measures within three weeks, that is by 6 January 2006, to ensure that the LRAU complied with Directive 93/37.

46. The reasoned opinion stated that the awarding of IAPs in accordance with the LRAU was contrary to (1) Directive 93/37 'and particularly Articles 1, 11 to 13 (and in the alternative Articles 3 and 15), as well as Chapter 2 of Title IV'; (2) Directive 92/50 (70) 'and in particular Articles 1, 15 to 19 and Chapter II of Title VI'; and (3) 'Articles 43 to 55 of the Treaty and general principles as stated by the Court'.

47. On 26 January 2006 Spain replied that the LUV, entering into force on 1 February 2006, was to replace the LRAU.

48. On 10 April 2006 the Commission sent an additional letter of formal notice in view of the continued infringement and as a result of the expiration of the deadline for transposition of Directive 2004/18, following another exchange of letters.

49. On 12 October 2006 the Commission sent Spain an additional reasoned opinion, considering that the attribution of IAPs under (1) the LUV was contrary to Directive 2004/18 and 'certain general principles of EU law derived from the EC Treaty'; and (2) the LRAU (for the period 21 March 2005 to 31 January 2006) was contrary to Articles 2, 6, 24, 30, 31(4)(a), 36, 48(2) and 53 of Directive 2004/18 and 'the principle of equal treatment and non-discrimination, as derived from the EC Treaty and case-law of the Court, Articles 10 and 49 EC' and in the alternative Title III of Directive 2004/18, dealing with works concessions.

50. Not being satisfied with Spain's response to the additional reasoned opinion, the Commission decided to bring the present action where it asks the Court to declare that, (1) in awarding IAPs in accordance with the LRAU, Spain 'has failed to fulfil its obligations under [Directive 93/37] and particularly Articles 1, 6(6), 11, 12 and Chapter 2 of Title IV thereof (Articles 24 to 29)'; and (2) in awarding IAPs in accordance with the LUV (as implemented by Decree 67/2006 of the Region of Valencia of 12 May, establishing the Regulation of Town Planning and Management (71)), Spain 'has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2, 6, 24, 30, 31(4)(a), 48(2) and 53(2) of Directive 2004/18'.

III – Scope of the case

51. During the pre-litigation proceedings as well as in its written pleadings before the Court the Commission has touched upon a lot of issues that are outside the scope of the infringement action as defined in the form of order sought. Therefore it is important to set out the exact ambit of the present infringement action.

52. Even though the Commission has not explicitly excluded direct management IAPs from the form of order sought, this infringement action must be interpreted as concerning only the indirect management IAP since the complaints it raises, which relate to the way that the developer is chosen, can only logically concern the indirect management procedure. (72) Therefore, the Court is required to analyse whether this relationship falls within the scope of the directives in question, and if so whether it breaches them.

53. If the award of the contract to the developer is not considered as falling within the scope of the directives in question the Court should not, in my opinion, analyse whether the indirect management IAP breaches the Treaty since the Commission has not asked the Court to declare the incompatibility of the IAP with the Treaty or with any general principles in particular. (73) While the Commission raised the potential incompatibility with the Treaty and the general principles as derived from the case-law of the Court in the reasoned opinions, it has not done so before the Court.

54. The Commission is of course permitted to restrict the ambit of its case before the Court. When that occurs, however, the Court cannot rule on issues that are outside the scope of the infringement action as set by the Commission. (74) The Court must observe the principle ne eat iudex ultra petita partium. A meticulous reading of the Commission's form of order sought is particularly important in the present infringement action since the pre-litigation procedure has been relatively long and complicated, the file is extensive and the pleadings of the parties cover a wider range of problems than those formulated in the form of order sought.

55. Since the Commission has only raised the issue of compatibility of the LRAU with Directive 93/37 and the LUV with Directive 2004/18, the compatibility of the LRAU with Directive 92/50 (75) is ultra vires in the present infringement action, as is the compatibility with the Treaty.

56. It should also be noted that the wording of the first plea relating to the LRAU and Directive 93/37 is open-ended, whereas the list in the second plea relating to the LUV and Directive 2004/18 is exhaustive. Therefore, as to the second plea, the Court can examine the alleged infringement only in relation to the articles of Directive 2004/18 expressly mentioned.

IV – Admissibility

57. Spain submits that the first claim is inadmissible for two main reasons: (1) the fact that the Commission started infringement proceedings when it knew that Directive 93/37 was about to expire and be replaced by Directive 2004/18, which had already been published at the time that the formal letter was sent. Since the regional law was repealed two years before the action was brought, there is no interest in pursuing the analysis; and (2) that the Commission had over ten years to bring the infringement proceedings and it chose to do it just before the expiration of Directive 93/37.

58. These complaints can be dismissed quite briefly. It is settled case-law that the Commission does not need to have a specific interest in bringing an infringement action, and it can choose to bring that action at any time it deems appropriate. (76)

59. Furthermore, according to settled case-law, the question of whether a Member State has failed to fulfil its obligations must be determined by reference to the situation persisting in the Member State at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. (77) The adoption of laws, regulations or administrative provisions after the date on which that period expired cannot usually be taken into account.

60. It is therefore with regard to the legislation in force on 6 January 2006, the date on which the period prescribed in the reasoned opinion of 15 December 2005 expired, that it must be decided whether Spain committed the infringement alleged in this complaint. At that date both the LRAU and Directive 93/37 were in force, even if they were to expire soon after. (78)

61. In its defence Spain raises another interesting point, however: that of the abnormally short three-week deadline over the Christmas period within which it was required to reply to the first reasoned opinion. (79)

62. However, the time-limit set by the Commission in its reasoned opinion must be reasonable. (80) The reasonableness must be decided on a case-by-case basis, taking into account all the circumstances. (81) Shorter periods may sometimes be allowed where there is an urgent need to remedy the breach. The Commission in the present infringement action has established no such urgency.

63. The period of three weeks (82) does not seem to me to be a reasonable time period. The Commission cannot have expected Spain to adapt the LRAU to Directive 93/37 in that time, or to stop awarding new IAPs pursuant to the LRAU, which would have been required in order to comply with the reasoned opinion. Indeed, it seems to me, that the only plausible explanation for the Commission to set such a short time-limit for compliance was because it knew that both directive 93/37 and the LRAU were about to expire, and it wanted to catch them within the scope of the infringement action.

64. The Court's case-law states that very short deadlines may be justified in particular situations, such as when the Member State concerned has knowledge of the Commission's complaints well in advance of the procedure in question. (83) In the present infringement action Spain had known of the Commission's position for almost nine months, since the formal letter was sent on 21 March 2005.

65. In any case, the short deadline does not seem to have had any negative consequences for Spain. They sent their reply to the reasoned opinion on 26 January 2006, and even though this was later than the date stated in the reasoned opinion, the Commission took their defence into account. Spain also had the opportunity of submitting additional observations in a letter of 17 March 2006. In the absence of negative consequences the case-law of the Court considers such cases admissible, even if the deadlines are not considered reasonable. (84)

66. Therefore, the case must be held to be fully admissible.

V – Do the relevant directives on public procurement apply to IAPs?

A – Land-use agreements and public procurement

67. Before analysing the legal classification of IAPs under Directive 2004/18 it is important to note their specific nature as public-private partnerships whose purpose is to enable the public authority to carry out its obligations in an efficient way. They do so by encouraging private development with the corresponding obligation to provide public infrastructures while doing so. (85)

68. Land-use and urban planning belong mainly to the competence of the Member States. In the Member States planning and zoning, land-use and urban development are usually public prerogatives. However, landowners, real property investors and building enterprises may often have an interest in developing areas that have not undergone a detailed planning process, in order to be able to exploit potential building rights pertaining to the land. In such cases the public authorities may also benefit since they do not have to commit their own scarce capital and administrative resources. This situation has lead to the development of various forms of cooperative arrangements ('land-use agreements') between the local government and private economic operators.

69. The aim of land-use agreements is to enable building activities to be carried out in a specified area. In such an agreement the local authorities give guarantees regarding the use of public prerogatives concerning planning (such as promising to define building rights in a certain way), in exchange for commitments by the economic operators in question. In other words, the adoption of a detailed plan with certain specified contents as to the amount, location and planned usage of building rights is exchanged (86) for a commitment to finance and execute the infrastructures contained in the detailed plan and, possibly, also buildings needed for public purposes such as public services or social housing.

70. The IAP is an example of a land-use agreement. The problem that arises in relation to it, however, is that its logic is based on a relationship where the initiative comes from a private person. (87) The purpose of the LRAU and the LUV has been to overcome the stagnation in urbanisation (and thus the stagnation in constructing public infrastructures which accompany such projects in Spain) by putting the emphasis on private initiative in the form of the developer's activity, which is distinct both from land ownership and public administrative activity. Hence, the IAPs constitute essentially a system for the selection of a land-use development alternative (88) as well as a developer to implement it in the most efficient way.

71. The effect of this in the public procurement sphere, and especially in relation to the execution of the related public works, however, as the Commission points out, is that such a system is inherently discriminatory due to the privileged position of the private initiator compared to subsequent tenderers. (89)

72. This is why the IAP system is very difficult to fit into the frame of public procurement rules.

73. In considering what fits the public procurement frame the Court's case-law to date has adopted a relatively broad, public procurement-friendly approach. (90) This has given rise to a debate as to whether land-use agreements are or should be classified as public contracts or more precisely as public works contracts as they often involve, directly or indirectly, the execution of public works by the developer or the landowners. (91) Especially problematic has been the question of pecuniary interest, more precisely, whether the attribution of new building rights by the public authority can be considered as financial consideration in exchange for the infrastructures the developer is obliged to build for the public authority. (92)

74. Recently, however, in Helmut Müller, (93) the Court declined to follow the functional interpretation proposed by the Commission in that case, which might have subjected a considerable part of the powers and activities traditionally reserved for local authorities in the field of planning and construction law, to the public works provisions. The Court stated that the purpose of the public procurement rules was to apply the rules of EU law to the award of contracts concluded on behalf of the State, regional or local authorities and other bodies governed by public law entities. (94) It is not the purpose of the mere exercise of urban planning powers, intended to give effect to the public interest, to obtain a contractual service or immediate economic benefit for the contracting authority as required by Directive 2004/18. (95)

75. The notion of a public works contract is an autonomous and objective concept of EU law. (96) However, in my opinion the Court should exercise a certain restraint if a broad interpretation of an EU law concept seems to lead, in practice, to an instrument of national law loosing its raison d'être or a detailed EU legislative act becoming applicable to phenomena that have not been considered by the EU legislature during the legislative process.

76. In the present infringement action a classification of the IAP as a public works contract would have the practical consequence of discouraging private initiatives in the field of planning and land development since, if considered to be within the scope of the public procurement directives, the IAP appears to be against the central aim of public procurement, namely the equal treatment of all participants. The only option left in planning law would then be the classical model where the public authorities draw up and adopt all documents relating to planning and land-use, finance and organise their execution and implementation directly and from the public purse.

77. Therefore, in considering whether this case raises any issues of public procurement, that is, in considering whether the present rules are covered by the directives in question, the Court should be careful not to over-stretch the meaning of certain criteria within the public procurement directives for the sake of fitting the present arrangement within the scope of the public procurement rules. To do so would amount to a Procrustean solution. (97)

B – The requirements for the application of the directives

78. It is uncontested that in the present case the municipalities awarding the IAPs are contracting authorities, that the developers are economic operators and that a written contract is concluded between the two, within the meaning of Directives 93/37 and 2004/18. Furthermore the Commission's case only concerns IAPs above the relevant monetary thresholds set out in Directives 93/37 and 2004/18.

79. What is in dispute however, is whether the contract in question gives rise to pecuniary interest within the meaning of the relevant directives.

1. Is there pecuniary interest originating from the contracting authority?

80. Pecuniary interest has been given a wide meaning by the Court, in view of the aims of the public procurement directives, namely, the opening up of national procurement markets to competition and the avoidance of barriers to the exercise of fundamental freedoms recognised in the Treaty. (98)

81. Although pecuniary interest does not therefore just include money, (99) the question is whether such pecuniary interest has to come from the contracting authority itself, or whether it is sufficient that pecuniary interest exists independently of who provides it. The latter interpretation would imply that the public works contract provisions would be applicable also in the case where a private party finances and executes public works on his own land, in agreement with and authorised by the contracting authority without any corresponding economic benefit to itself, and without the contracting authority having any legal obligation as to their execution. (100)

82. In La Scala the Court considered that there was pecuniary interest in that case, even though it was the owner-developer of the land who had to bear the development costs, because the municipality had an obligation to execute the necessary infrastructure works.

83. In my view that case is distinguishable from the present case. By waiving the planning development fee that was usually chargeable in such situations, the contracting authority suffered economic detriment which is not the case in the present proceedings.

84. In Parking Brixen the Court was of the view that consideration had to be paid directly by the contracting authority to the service providers for the contract to amount to a public service contract. (101) The Court was thus of the opinion that the service in question (the management of a public car park) was not a public service contract because the remuneration did not come from the public authority concerned, but from sums paid by third parties for the use of the car park in question. (102)

85. Recently, in Helmut Muller, Advocate General Mengozzi was of the opinion that the concept of pecuniary interest is based on the idea of an exchange of services between the contracting authority, which pays a price, and the contractor, who is required to execute a work or works. Thus, according to him, public contracts are clearly mutually binding. (103)

86. I agree with that view. In my opinion, for pecuniary interest to exist it is necessary that the contracting authority bears the economic detriment either positively in the form of a payment obligation towards the economic operator, or negatively as a loss of income or resources otherwise due.

87. Mere power of the contracting authority to require a third party to pay for the works or services cannot, contrary to the Commission's submissions, be sufficient since there is no mutually binding relationship in the nature of an exchange of performance with a tangible economic value between the contracting authority and the economic operators executing the works or services in question.

88. This is supported by the fact that one of the aims of the public procurement directives is to ensure that when contracting authorities spend money in public markets there is no distortion of competition. (104) It follows that where the contracting authority is not spending any public funds there is no danger of distorting competition within the meaning of Directives 93/37 and 2004/18. (105)

89. Thus, the pecuniary interest requirement implies that the contracting authority needs to use its own funds either directly or indirectly. (106) Direct financing will occur when the contracting authority uses public funds to pay for the works or services in question. Indirect financing will occur when the contracting authority suffers economic detriment as a result of the method of financing the works or services.

90. In the present infringement action it is the land developer that is responsible for financing the costs of the development in the indirect IAP procedure, but he is entitled to reimburse those from landowners. Thus it is the landowner who pays for the public works necessitated by the development.

91. As a result of the requirement for pecuniary interest not being met in this infringement action, the only way that Directives 93/37 and 2004/18 can apply to the regional legislation is if it can be said to amount to a public works concession, since public service concessions are excluded from those directives. (107)

2. Is there a public works concession?

92. In the present infringement action there is a great debate as to whether the principal purpose of the IAP is a service or the execution of public works, as it is uncontested that both elements are present. (108) We do not need to consider that question, however, since the present situation does not, in my view, amount to a public works concession, and the infringement action does not concern public service concessions.

93. A public works concession is a contract of the same type as a public works contract except for the fact that the consideration for the works consists either solely in the right to exploit the work or in this right together with payment. (109) In the present situation the developer (who is the concessionaire in this situation) does not have a right to exploit the resulting work.

94. In the IAP all the public works defined in the contract (that is the construction of roads and pavements, parking places, road signs, water, gas and electricity distribution networks, disposal of residual water, and the construction of green spaces including parks and trees) become the property of the contracting authority upon completion. (110) As such they may be used for free (streets, parks, public buildings) or against payments set by the contracting authority or the body that has been attributed the management and maintenance of the structures. The developers do not receive a right to exploit these public works because they do not have the possibility of recovering the charges from the user of the structures in those cases. Instead they receive remuneration in cash or as plots of land from the landowners. However, receiving the plots of land cannot be said to be exploitation of the public works since the public works defined by an IAP consist of the construction of infrastructure as well as the necessary connections to existing networks. (111) These plots are their property. They can of course exploit them but they do so as owner and not as concessionaire.

95. Therefore, there is no right to exploit the works resulting from the IAP and the contract cannot amount to a works concession even if it were held that the principal aim of the contract is the execution of works.

96. If the principal purpose of the IAP were to be classified as a service, the question arises of whether the developer has the right to exploit his own service. (112) The answer to this question is not decisive in resolving the present infringement action, however, since if it were to amount to a service concession it would be outside the scope of the pertinent provisions of the directives mentioned in the form of order sought in the Commission's application.

97. However, even assuming that the ownership of land that the developer receives could be said to amount to a right to exploitation being granted (which is not my view), such a right is granted for an indefinite period and is thus contrary to the definition given to a concession by the Court in Helmut Muller and Pressetext. (113)

98. Therefore, in my view, Directives 93/37 and 2004/18 do not apply to the present situation, and thus the Commission's case should be dismissed.

VI – Conclusion

99. I propose that the action be dismissed and the Commission be condemned to pay the costs.

On details of how private initiatives have helped the stagnation in the development process in Valencia see Muñoz Gielen and Korthals Altes, cited in footnote 27.

86 – However, in many legal systems the building rights are not understood as being created by the planning decisions of public authorities but they somehow pre-exist as property rights of the landowners of non-developed land even if they can't be exercised before adoption of a detailed plan. This seems to be the point of departure of the Spanish law as well. (Muñoz Gielen and Korthals Altes, cited in footnote 27, at pages 61 to 62). Legally it is also often the case that the possible content of a detailed plan is subject to a public law framework, which legally restricts the local government's possibilities to commit itself to the adoption of a certain plan in exchange for commitments by a private undertaking.

87 – Even though technically both the local authority and the private person can initiate an IAP, the reason for the model adopted in the LRAU in the 1990s, which emphasises the central role of the developer was to increase private initiatives in urbanisation projects. For more information on this see Muñoz Gielen and Korthals Altes, cited in footnote 27, at page 65.

88 – Spain has explained that the selection of an IAP initiative may entail, for example, a choice between building a shopping mall or a housing area.

89 – However, the LUV has introduced a distinction between the developer and the constructor of public works by obliging him, with some exceptions, to appoint a constructor in accordance with the EU public procurement rules.

The previous case-law has considered that the aims pursued by the authorities are irrelevant (La Scala, cited in footnote 90; Commission v Italy, cited in footnote 90, paragraph 70) focusing instead on whether the criteria for the existence of the public contract are fulfilled.

105 – This situation is analogous to those where the EU State aid law provisions do not apply because of an absence of burden on public resources corresponding to the advantage created by the relevant national rules as the advantage is funded through private means. See for example: Joined Cases C-72/91 and C-73/91 Slomann Neptun [1993] ECR 887, paragraphs 19 and 21; C-379/98 PresussenElektra [2001] ECR 2099, paragraphs 59 to 61.

106 – In Case C-126/03 Commission v Germany [2004] ECR I-11197, paragraph 20, the Court stated that use of public resources is not a factor that determines whether or not there is a public contract for the purposes of Articles 8 and 11 of Directive 92/50, cited in footnote 70. In that case the public authority (City of Munich) was awarded a public service contract from another contracting authority, and the issue was whether it had been legal for the city to entrust in advance a private undertaking with the responsibility for a service stemming from the first mentioned contract without invitation to tender under the directive in question. In that context there was clearly an economic exchange between the city and the private undertaking even if it was obviously financed with 'private' income of the city resulting from the award of public service contract to it. I don't think that the Court intended to declare that the notion of a pecuniary interest would not be an essential element of a public contract or that such pecuniary interest must not directly or indirectly originate from the resources of the contracting authority. The whole ratio of EU public procurement legislation is to create competitive, transparent and non-discriminatory conditions of economic exchanges between public authorities and undertakings, and not to regulate the economic relations between undertakings procuring goods or services from each other.

107 – Directive 93/37 only applies to works, and Article 17 of Directive 2004/18 excludes the application of that directive to services. Article 17 is without prejudice to Article 3 of the Directive 2004/18, but that article is not pertinent for the purposes of this case.

108 – In this case the answer to the question on the principal purpose of the contract depends on whether emphasis is put on the structure of development costs or on the development gain generated by an IAP. According to the scattered information included in the file, the public works component is obviously much bigger than the service component in the development costs. However, Spain emphasises the character of IAPs as services relating to immovable property investment with reference to the fact that the public works are only incidental to the overall objective of an IAP which is to create building plots for private building activities. Hence, economically the IAP has to generate for the landowners economic opportunities whose value exceeds the costs of public works and other development costs including the remuneration of the developer. In the two referred IAPs described in Muñoz Gielen and Korthals Altes, cited in footnote 27, at page 69, the development costs per square meter of building rights were EUR 89 and EUR 54, and the market price of developed land per square meter of building rights was respectively EUR 512 and about EUR 500. This may support the claim that the economic and legal purpose of an IAP is that of a public service provided by the developer to the landowners, not execution of public works for the contracting authority.

110 – According to Article 16 TRLS, the landowners are obliged to give to the competent authorities the land needed for roads, green spaces and other common areas, as well as between 5 and 15 per cent of their lands for public purposes. That article is implemented by Article 23 LUV specifying the obligation on landowners to cede for free land for public purposes as a part of development. (It should be recalled that the building plots the landowners get are not necessarily situated on the lands they owned before the IAP.) According to Article 180(2) LUV re-distribution (reparcelacion forzosa) entails transferring these areas to the local authority concerned. Article 188(2) LUV provides when the urbanisation works will be deemed to have been received by the administration and the cession of maintenance obligation of them. From all this it follows that if the IAPs were classified as public service contracts, they would be excluded from the scope of Directive 2004/18 as they concern acquisition of land and other immovable property.

111 – According to Article 11 LUV urban plots (solares) are plots which have been developed and have at least the following services: (i) access by one or more roads open to the public, (ii) supply of drinking water and electricity at a level sufficient to meet the expected demand, (iii) a sewage network, (iv) pedestrian access with paved and lit streets. In addition, urban plots must have been linked with the necessary infrastructure, to public utilities in the surrounding land.

112 – Spain submits that the IAP should be classified as a service concession where the developer gets the right to provide and exploit a public service.

---

113 – The Court has held that the granting of a concession for an indefinite period of time might impede competition over time and would thus be contrary to the central aim of the public procurement rules. See Case C-454/06 Pressetext [2008] ECR I-4401, paragraph 74; Helmut Muller, cited in footnote 93, paragraph 79.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Fourth Chamber)

23 December 2009 (*)

(Public service contracts – Directive 2004/18 – Concepts of 'contractor', 'supplier' and 'service provider' – Concept of 'economic operator' – Universities and research institutes – Group ('consorzio') of universities and public authorities – Where the primary object under the statutes is non-profit-making – Admission to a procedure for the award of a public contract)

In Case C-305/08,

REFERENCE for a preliminary ruling under Article 234 EC from the Consiglio di Stato (Italy), made by decision of 23 June 2008, received at the Court on 4 July 2008, in the proceedings

Consorzio Nazionale Interuniversitario per le Scienze del Mare (CoNISMa)

v

Regione Marche,

THE COURT (Fourth Chamber), composed of K. Lenaerts, President of the Third Chamber, acting for the President of the Fourth Chamber, R. Silva de Lapuerta, E. Juhász (Rapporteur), G. Arestis and J. Malenovský, Judges,

Advocate General: J. Mazák,

after considering the observations submitted on behalf of:

– the Consorzio Nazionale Interuniversitario per le Scienze del Mare (CoNISMa), by I. Deluigi, avvocato,

– the Czech Government, by M. Smolek, acting as Agent,

– the Austrian Government, by M. Fruhmann, acting as Agent,

– the Commission of the European Communities, by C. Zadra and D. Recchia, acting as Agents,

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 3 September 2009,

gives the following

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 1(2)(a) and (8), first and second subparagraphs, of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114).

2 The reference was made in proceedings between the Consorzio Nazionale Interuniversitario per le Scienze del Mare (National Inter-University Marine Sciences Consortium, 'CoNISMa') and the Regione Marche (the Marche Region) relating to the latter's decision not to admit the consortium to a procedure for the award of a public services contract.

Legal context

Community legislation

3 Recital 4 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 states as follows:

‘Member States should ensure that the participation of a body governed by public law as a tenderer in a procedure for the award of a public contract does not cause any distortion of competition in relation to private tenderers.’

4 Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18 is worded as follows:

‘“Public contracts” are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive.’

5 Article 1(8) of Directive 2004/18 provides as follows:

‘The terms “contractor”, “supplier” and “service provider” mean any natural or legal person or public entity or group of such persons and/or bodies which offers on the market, respectively, the execution of works and/or a work, products or services.

The term “economic operator” shall cover equally the concepts of contractor, supplier and service provider. It is used merely in the interest of simplification.

6 Article 1(9) of Directive 2004/18 is worded as follows:

‘“Contracting authorities” means the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several of such authorities or one or several of such bodies governed by public law.

A “body governed by public law” means any body:

(a) established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character;

(b) having legal personality; and

(c) financed, for the most part, by the State, regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities, or by other bodies governed by public law.

7 Article 4 of Directive 2004/18, entitled ‘Economic Operators’, provides as follows:

‘1. Candidates or tenderers who, under the law of the Member State in which they are established, are entitled to provide the relevant service, shall not be rejected solely on the ground that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they would be required to be either natural or legal persons.

2. Groups of economic operators may submit tenders or put themselves forward as candidates. In order to submit a tender or a request to participate, these groups may not be required by the contracting authorities to assume a specific legal form; however, the group selected may be required to do so when it has been awarded the contract, to the extent that this change is necessary for the satisfactory performance of the contract.'

8 Article 44 of Directive 2004/18, entitled 'Verification of the suitability and choice of participants and award of contracts', provides in the first paragraph thereof as follows:

'Contracts shall be awarded on the basis of the criteria laid down in Articles 53 and 55, taking into account Article 24, after the suitability of the economic operators not excluded under Articles 45 and 46 has been checked by contracting authorities in accordance with the criteria of economic and financial standing, of professional and technical knowledge or ability referred to in Articles 47 to 52, and, where appropriate, with the non-discriminatory rules and criteria referred to in paragraph 3.'

9 Article 55 of Directive 2004/18, entitled 'Abnormally low tenders', is worded as follows:

'1. If, for a given contract, tenders appear to be abnormally low in relation to the goods, works or services, the contracting authority shall, before it may reject those tenders, request in writing details of the constituent elements of the tender which it considers relevant.

Those details may relate in particular to:

(a) the economics of the construction method, the manufacturing process or the services provided;

(b) the technical solutions chosen and/or any exceptionally favourable conditions available to the tenderer for the execution of the work, for the supply of the goods or services;

(c) the originality of the work, supplies or services proposed by the tenderer;

(d) compliance with the provisions relating to employment protection and working conditions in force at the place where the work, service or supply is to be performed;

(e) the possibility of the tenderer obtaining State aid.

2. The contracting authority shall verify those constituent elements by consulting the tenderer, taking account of the evidence supplied.

3. Where a contracting authority establishes that a tender is abnormally low because the tenderer has obtained State aid, the tender can be rejected on that ground alone only after consultation with the tenderer where the latter is unable to prove, within a sufficient time limit fixed by the contracting authority, that the aid in question was granted legally. Where the contracting authority rejects a tender in these circumstances, it shall inform the Commission of that fact.'

National legislation

10 Article 3(19) and (22) of Legislative Decree No 163 of 12 April 2006 establishing the Codice dei contratti pubblici relativi a lavori, servizi e forniture in attuazione delle direttive 2004/17/CE e 2004/18/CE (Public Works Contracts, Public Supply Contracts and Public Service Contracts Code implementing Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC) (GURI No 100 of 2 May 2006, ordinary supplement) ('Legislative Decree No 163/2006') provides as follows:

'19. The terms "contractor", "supplier" and "service provider" mean a natural or legal person, or body without legal personality, including a European Economic Interest Group (EEIG) formed pursuant to Legislative Decree No 240 of 23 July 1991, which offers on the market, respectively, the execution of works or a work, the supply of products or the provision of services.

22. The term "economic operator" shall include a contractor, a supplier, a service provider or a group or consortium of these.'

11 Article 34 of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 provides, under the heading ‘Entities to which public contracts may be awarded (Articles 4 and 5 of Directive 2004/18)’, as follows:

‘1. Without prejudice to the restrictions expressly provided for, the following entities are entitled to participate in procedures for the award of public procurement contracts:

(a) individual commercial operators, including artisans, commercial companies and partnerships and cooperatives;

(b) consortia of production- and labour-cooperatives … and … consortia of artisans …;

(c) permanent consortia, constituted inter alia as joint venture companies for the purpose of Article 2615b of the Civil Code, between individual contractors (including artisans), commercial companies or partnerships or production- and labour-cooperatives, in accordance with the provision in Article 36;

(d) special purpose groupings of competitors, whose members include the entities referred to in subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) …;

(e) ordinary consortia of competitors referred to in Article 2602 of the Civil Code whose members include the entities referred to in subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) of the present paragraph, including those constituted as companies or partnerships …;

(f) entities who have entered into a European Economic Interest Group (EEIG) contract …;

12 After the material events of the main proceedings had occurred, Legislative Decree No 152 of 11 September 2008 (GURI No 231 of 2 October 2008) added the following subparagraph (f bis) to the above list:

‘economic operators within the meaning of Article 3(22), established in other Member States and constituted according to the applicable legislation of the Member State concerned.’

13 Lastly, Article 2082 of the Italian Civil Code provides that a ‘commercial operator’ (imprenditore) is any person who, in a professional capacity, engages in economic activity on an organised basis in order to produce or exchange goods or services.

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

14 It is apparent from the order for reference that the Regione Marche organised a public tendering procedure for the award of a service contract entailing the acquisition of marine and seismic stratigraphic data and the taking of core borings and samples from the sea along the coastline between Pesaro and Civitanova Marche.

15 CoNISMa applied to participate in that procedure. After expressing reservations as to whether CoNISMa was eligible to participate in the tendering procedure in question, the contracting authority decided to exclude it by Decisions 4, 18 and 23 of 23 April 2007.

16 CoNISMa challenged its exclusion by way of an extraordinary petition to the President of the Italian Republic, a special procedure provided for by the Italian legal system, arguing that if Article 34 of Legislative Decree 163/2006 were interpreted as meaning that it contains an exhaustive list, not including universities and research institutes, and that such bodies are therefore not eligible to participate in a procedure for the award of a public contract, such an interpretation would be incompatible with Directive 2004/18. In the framework of that extraordinary petition, the Ministero dell’ambiente e della tutela del territorio (Italian Ministry of the Environment and Protection of the Territory) requested an opinion of the Consiglio di Stato (Council of State), for which provision is made under the relevant national legislation.

17 The Consiglio di Stato observes that, in order to deliver its opinion, it must establish whether an inter-university group, such as CoNISMa, can be regarded as an ‘economic operator’ within the meaning of Directive 2004/18 and, accordingly, whether it may take part in a tendering procedure for the award of a public service contract such as that at issue in the main proceedings. The referring court expresses reservations in that connection, on the basis of the following considerations.

18 The Consiglio di Stato states, as a preliminary point, that CoNISMa is a group (‘consorzio’) of 24 Italian universities and three ministries. According to its statute, it is non-profit-making and its object is to promote and coordinate research and other scientific activities and their applications in the field of marine sciences among the member universities. It can take part in tendering procedures and other procedures for competitive tendering organised by public authorities and by companies operating in the public and private sphere. Its activities are financed primarily by grants awarded by the Ministry for Universities and Research and other public authorities as well as by Italian or foreign public and private bodies.

19 The Consiglio di Stato refers, first, to Article 1(c) of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1) — to which Directive 2004/18 was the successor — which provides that ‘service provider shall mean any natural or legal person, including a public body, which offers services’ and observes that that wording appears to indicate an intention to restrict the possibility of concluding contracts with contracting authorities to entities which are engaged ‘in an institutional capacity’ in the activity corresponding to the service to be provided under the contract in question. If that approach is adopted, with the exception of private economic operators, tendering procedures are open only to public bodies which provide, for pecuniary gain, the services covered by that contract, in accordance with the function ascribed to them by the legal system, university bodies thus being excluded. That approach would appear to have been confirmed by the Court in Case C-220/05 Auroux and Others [2007] ECR I-385, paragraph 44, which held that Community legislation on public contracts applied to the person concerned ‘as an economic operator active on the market’. That approach also appears to have been followed in Article 3(19) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, which provides that a service provider is an economic operator ‘which offers’ services ‘on the market’.

20 Second, the Consiglio di Stato points out that the position adopted on this question in Italian case-law is not without ambiguity. Certain courts have taken the view that public tendering procedures are open to natural and legal persons operating as a business and to public bodies which offer, in accordance with their institutional organisation, services similar to those covered by the tendering procedure. From that perspective, universities cannot be included in such categories of private and public undertakings, since their institutional remit is to develop teaching and research activities. Following a different approach, it has been held that public universities and consortia of such universities can take part in procedures for the award of public service contracts, provided that the provision of services in question is compatible with their institutional objectives and the provisions laid down in their statutes.

21 The Consiglio di Stato refers, thirdly, to the position adopted by the regulatory authority for public contracts, which distinguishes between economic operators and entities, such as non-economic public bodies, universities and university departments, which do not fall into the former category because their purpose is not to carry out economic activity, which is characterised by the creation of wealth. Such entities cannot therefore take part in public tendering procedures unless they set up companies expressly for that purpose by exercising the autonomy granted to universities under national legislation. That view is confirmed by Article 34 of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, which contains an exhaustive list of the entities authorised to take part in public tendering procedures.

22 By way of justification of its reservations, the Consiglio di Stato refers, lastly, to the Court’s case-law, according to which Community public procurement rules must be interpreted by reference to a criterion of a functional nature, so that the fundamental principle of effective competition is not circumvented (Case C-337/06 Bayerischer Rundfunk and Others [2007] ECR I-11173). With regard in particular to public service contracts, the Court has drawn attention to the principal objective of the Community rules in this field, namely the free movement of services and the opening-up to the widest possible undistorted competition in all the Member States (Case C-26/03 Stadt Halle and RPL Lochau [2005] ECR I-1, paragraphs 44 and 47).

23 In the light of that case-law, the Consiglio di Stato states that the admission of universities, research institutes and consortia of those bodies to public tendering procedures may infringe the principle of free competition in two respects. First, it could potentially remove from the open market a number of public contracts, to which ease of access would in practice be hampered for a not inconsiderable proportion of ordinary undertakings. Second, it would place the contractor in a position of unfair advantage, guaranteeing it economic security provided by the constant and predictable flow of public finance, which is not available to other economic operators. However, the Consiglio di Stato takes the view that a restrictive interpretation of the concept of 'economic operator', which is dependent on the stable presence of such an operator 'on the market', thus precluding universities, research institutes and consortia of such bodies from taking part in public tendering procedures, would seriously undermine cooperation between public and private entities and between researchers and commercial operators and ultimately constitute a restriction on free competition.

24 In the light of the foregoing, the Consiglio decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Must the provisions of Directive 2004/18/EC ... be interpreted as precluding a consortium made up solely of Italian universities and State bodies … from taking part in a tendering procedure for the award of a service contract such as that for the acquisition of geophysical data and marine samples?

(2) Are the provisions of Italian law contained in Article 3(22) and (19) and Article 34 of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, which provide, respectively: that "the term 'economic operator' shall include a contractor, supplier, service provider or a group or consortium of these" and "the terms 'contractor', 'supplier' and 'service provider' shall mean any natural or legal person, or body without legal personality, including a European Economic Interest Group (EEIG) ..., which 'offers on the market', respectively, the execution of works or a work, the supply of products or the provision of services", contrary to Directive 2004/18/EC … if interpreted as restricting participation in tendering procedures to professional providers of such services and excluding entities whose primary objects are non-profit-making, such as research?'

The questions referred

25 It should be noted, first, that, according to the Court's case-law, when it issues an opinion in the context of an extraordinary petition, such as that in the main proceedings, the Consiglio di Stato constitutes a court or tribunal for the purposes of Article 234 EC (Joined Cases C-69/96 to C-79/96 Garofalo and Others [1997] ECR I-5603, paragraph 27).

Question 1

26 By this question, the Consiglio di Stato asks, in essence, whether Directive 2004/18 must be interpreted as precluding a consortium made up solely of universities and public authorities from taking part in a public tendering procedure for the award of a service contract.

27 As is apparent from the order for reference, the provisions of Directive 2004/18 considered to be relevant by the national court are, in particular, those in Article 1(2)(a) and (8), first and second subparagraphs, because those provisions refer to the concept of 'economic operator'. Moreover, according to the order, the consortium in question is, for the most part, non-profit-making and does not have the organisational structure of an undertaking or a regular presence on the market.

28 For the purposes of answering that question, it should be pointed out, first, that the provisions of Directive 2004/18 do not contain a definition of 'economic operator' and, second, do not distinguish between tenderers on the basis of whether they are primarily profit-making and nor do they expressly preclude entities such as that in question in the main proceedings. However, considered in the light of the Court's case-law, those provisions contain sufficient indications for it to be possible to give a useful answer to the referring court.

29 For instance, recital 4 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 makes it clear that ‘a body governed by public law’ can participate as a tenderer in a procedure for the award of a public contract.

30 Similarly, the first and second subparagraphs of Article 1(8) of the directive grant the status of ‘economic operator’ not only to any natural or legal person but also, expressly, to any ‘public entity’ or group consisting of such entities offering services on the market. The concept of ‘public entity’ may also, therefore, include bodies which are not primarily profit-making, are not structured as an undertaking and do not have a continuous presence on the market.

31 Moreover, paragraph 1 of Article 4 of Directive 2004/18, which is entitled ‘Economic operators’, prohibits Member States from providing that candidates or tenderers who, under the rules of the Member State in which they are established, are entitled to provide the services covered by the contract notice, are to be rejected solely on the ground that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they are required to be either natural or legal persons. Nor does that provision distinguish between candidates and tenderers on the basis of whether they are governed by public or private law.

32 As regards the question raised by the referring court concerning a possible distortion of competition due to the participation in a public tendering procedure by entities, such as the applicant in the main proceedings, which enjoy a position of unfair advantage vis-à-vis private economic operators on account of the public finance which they receive, it should be noted that recital 4 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 imposes an obligation on Member States to ensure that the participation of a body governed by public law in a public tendering procedure does not cause such a distortion. That obligation also applies with regard to entities such as the applicant.

33 Reference should be made in that connection to the obligations upon and options available to contracting authorities under Article 55(3) of Directive 2004/18 in cases involving abnormally low tenders where the tenderer has obtained State aid. The Court has also recognised that, in certain specific circumstances, the contracting authorities are required, or at the very least permitted, to take into account the existence of subsidies, and in particular of aid incompatible with the Treaty, in order, where appropriate, to exclude tenderers in receipt of such aid (see, to that effect, Case C-94/99 ARGE [2000] ECR I-11037, paragraph 29).

34 However, the fact that an economic operator may enjoy an unfair advantage because it receives public finance or State aid cannot justify the exclusion of entities, such as the applicant in the main proceedings, from a public tendering procedure a priori and without further consideration.

35 It follows from the above considerations that the Community legislature did not intend to restrict the concept of ‘economic operator which offers services on the market’ solely to operators which are structured as a business or to impose specific conditions which can restrict access to tendering procedures, from the outset, on the basis of the legal form and internal organisation of the economic operator.

36 That interpretation finds support in the Court’s case-law.

37 The Court has thus held that one of the primary objectives of Community rules on public procurement is to attain the widest possible opening-up to competition (see, inter alia, to that effect Bayerischer Rundfunk and Others, paragraph 39) and that it is the concern of Community law to ensure the widest possible participation by tenderers in a call for tenders (Case C-538/07 Assitur [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 26). It should be added that the widest possible opening-up to competition is contemplated not only from the point of view of the Community interest in the free movement of goods and services but also the interest of the contracting authority concerned itself, which will thus have greater choice as to the most advantageous tender which is most suitable for the needs of the public authority in question (see, to that effect, with regard to abnormally low tenders, Joined Cases C-147/06 and C-148/06 SECAP and Santorso [2008] ECR I-3565, paragraph 29).

38 In that spirit of opening up public contracts to the widest possible competition, the Court has also held that Community rules governing that field are applicable when the entity with which a contracting authority plans to conclude a contract for pecuniary interest is itself also a contracting authority (see, to that effect, Stadt Halle and RPL Lochau, paragraph 47 and the case-law cited). According to Article 1(9) of Directive 2004/18, a contracting authority is an entity not having an industrial or commercial character which performs a task in the general interest. As a general rule, such a body does not pursue gainful activity on the market.

39 Similarly, the Court has held that Community rules preclude any national legislation which excludes candidates or tenderers entitled under the law of the Member State in which they are established to provide the services in question from the award of public service contracts with a value greater than the threshold for the application of the relevant directives, solely on the ground that those candidates or tenderers do not have the legal form corresponding to a specific category of legal persons (see, to that effect, Case C-357/06 Frigerio Luigi and C. [2007] ECR I-12311, paragraph 22).

40 Moreover, it should be noted that, according to the Court's case-law, first, the mere fact that contracting authorities allow bodies which receive subsidies enabling them to submit tenders at prices appreciably lower than those of competing, unsubsidised, tenderers to take part in a procedure for the award of a public contract does not amount to a breach of the principle of equal treatment and, second, if the Community legislature had intended to require contracting authorities to exclude such tenderers, it would have stated this explicitly (ARGE, paragraphs 25 and 26).

41 Finally, the Court's case-law also provides that Community rules do not require that, in order to be classed as a contractor – that is, an economic operator – a person who enters into a contract with a contracting authority must be capable of direct performance using his own resources. The person in question need only be able to arrange for execution of the works in question and to furnish the necessary guarantees in that connection (see, to that effect, Case C-399/98 Ordine degli Architetti and Others [2001] ECR I-5409, paragraph 90).

42 It therefore follows from both Community rules and the Court's case-law that any person or entity which, in the light of the conditions laid down in a contract notice, believes that it is capable of carrying out the contract, either directly or by using subcontractors, is eligible to submit a tender or put itself forward as a candidate, regardless of whether it is governed by public law or private law, whether it is active as a matter of course on the market or only on an occasional basis and whether or not it is subsidised by public funds. As the Czech Government correctly observed, whether such an entity is actually able to satisfy the conditions laid down in the contract notice must be assessed at a later stage in the procedure, by applying the criteria set out in Articles 44 to 52 of Directive 2004/18.

43 It should be added that the effect of a restrictive interpretation of the concept of 'economic operator' would be that contracts concluded between contracting authorities and bodies which are primarily non-profit-making would not be regarded as 'public contracts', could be awarded by mutual agreement and would thus not be covered by Community rules on equal treatment and transparency, which would be inconsistent with the aim of those rules.

44 Moreover, as the Consiglio di Stato stated, such an interpretation would undermine cooperation between public and private entities and between researchers and commercial operators and constitute a restriction of competition.

45 In the light of the foregoing, the answer to the first question must be that the provisions of Directive 2004/18, in particular those in Article 1(2)(a) and (8), first and second subparagraphs, which refer to the concept of 'economic operator', must be interpreted as permitting entities which are primarily non-profit-making and do not have the organisational structure of an undertaking or a regular presence on the market – such as universities and research institutes and consortia made up of universities and public authorities – to take part in a public tendering procedure for the award of a service contract.

46 By this question, the Consiglio di Stato asks, in essence, whether the provisions of Directive 2004/18, in particular those in Article 1(2)(a) and (8), first and second subparagraphs, preclude national legislation transposing that directive into national law where such legislation is interpreted as restricting participation in public procurement procedures to service providers who offer services on the market on a systematic and commercial basis and excluding entities, such as universities and research institutes, which are primarily non-profit-making.

47 It should be noted, as is apparent from the wording of Article 4(1) of Directive 2004/18, that the Member States have a discretion as to whether or not to allow certain categories of economic operators to provide certain services.

48 Accordingly, as the Commission correctly observed, the Member States can regulate the activities of entities, such as universities and research institutes, which are non-profit-making and whose primary object is teaching and research. They can, inter alia, determine whether or not such entities are authorised to operate on the market, according to whether the activity in question is compatible with their objectives as an institution and those laid down in their statutes.

49 However, if and to the extent that such entities are entitled to offer certain services on the market, the national legislation transposing Directive 2004/18 into domestic law cannot prevent them from taking part in public procedures for the award of contracts for the provision of those services. Such a prohibition would be incompatible with the provisions of Directive 2004/18, as interpreted in connection with the examination of the first question referred.

50 In such a situation, it is for the national court to interpret domestic law, so far as possible, in the light of the wording and the purpose of Directive 2004/18 with a view to achieving the results sought by the latter, favouring the interpretation of the national rules which is the most consistent with that purpose in order thereby to achieve an outcome compatible with the provisions of the directive, setting aside, if necessary, any contrary provision of national law (see Case C-414/07 Magoora [2008] ECR I-0000, paragraph 44).

51 The answer to the second question must therefore be that Directive 2004/18 must be construed as precluding an interpretation of national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which prohibits entities, such as universities and research institutes, which are primarily non-profit-making from taking part in a procedure for the award of a public contract, even though such entities are entitled under national law to offer the services covered by the contract in question.

Costs

52 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Fourth Chamber) hereby rules:

1. The provisions of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts, in particular those in Article 1(2)(a) and (8), first and second subparagraphs, which refer to the concept of 'economic operator', must be interpreted as permitting entities which are primarily non-profit-making and do not have the organisational structure of an undertaking or a regular presence on the market – such as universities and research institutes and consortia made up of universities and public authorities – to take part in a public tendering procedure for the award of a service contract.

2. Directive 2004/18 must be construed as precluding an interpretation of national legislation, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, which prohibits entities, such as universities and research institutes, which are primarily non-profit-making from taking part in a procedure for the award of a public contract, even though such entities are entitled under national law to offer the services covered by the contract in question.

delivered on 3 September 2009 (1)

Case C-305/08

Consorzio Nazionale Interuniversitario per le Scienze del Mare (CoNISMa)
v
Regione Marche

(Reference for a preliminary ruling from the Consiglio di Stato (Italy))

(Public service contracts – Directive 2004/18/EC – Procedure for the award of public procurement contracts – Concept of 'economic operator' – Exclusion of non-profit-making entities whose objects include research, such as universities)

1. The present reference for a preliminary ruling from the Consiglio di Stato (Council of State) (Italy) concerns the interpretation of the concept of 'economic operator', set out in particular in the second paragraph of Article 1(8) of Directive 2004/18/EC. (2) The referring court seeks to know whether non-profit-making entities which are not necessarily present on the market on a regular basis, in particular universities and research institutes as well as groups (consortia) of those universities and research institutes and State bodies, are allowed to participate in a public service tendering procedure in relation to the acquisition of geophysical data and marine samples. In addition, the referring court asks whether a restrictive interpretation of the national legislation, which provides that the above entities are excluded from such participation, is contrary to the Directive.

I – Legal framework

A – Community law

2. Article 1(2)(a) of the Directive provides that '"Public contracts" are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive'. (3)

3. According to Article 1(8) of the Directive:

'the terms "contractor", "supplier" and "service provider" mean any natural or legal person or public entity or group of such persons and/or bodies which offers on the market, respectively, the execution of works and/or a work, products or services.

The term "economic operator" shall cover equally the concepts of contractor, supplier and service provider. It is used merely in the interest of simplification.

4. Article 4 of the Directive is entitled 'Economic operators' and states:

'1. Candidates or tenderers who, under the law of the Member State in which they are established, are entitled to provide the relevant service, shall not be rejected solely on the ground that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they would be required to be either natural or legal persons.

2. Groups of economic operators may submit tenders or put themselves forward as candidates. In order to submit a tender or a request to participate, these groups may not be required by the contracting authorities to assume a specific legal form; however, the group selected may be required to do so when it has been awarded the contract, to the extent that this change is necessary for the satisfactory performance of the contract.' (5)

5. Finally, Article 44(1) of the Directive provides under the heading 'verification of the suitability and choice of participants and award of contracts' that 'contracts shall be awarded on the basis of the criteria laid down in Articles 53 and 55, taking into account Article 24, after the suitability of the economic operators not excluded under Articles 45 and 46 has been checked by contracting authorities in accordance with the criteria of economic and financial standing, of professional and technical knowledge or ability referred to in Articles 47 to 52, and, where appropriate, with the non-discriminatory rules and criteria referred to in paragraph 3'. (6)

B – National law

6. Article 3(19) and (22) of the Public Contracts Code, enacted by Legislative Decree No 163 of 12 April 2006, (7) provides, respectively that 'the terms "contractor", "supplier" and "service provider" shall mean any natural or legal person, or body without legal personality, including a European Economic Interest Group (EEIG) formed pursuant to Legislative Decree No 240 of 23 July 1991, which "offers on the market", respectively, the execution of works or a work, the supply of products, or the provision of services' and that 'the term "economic operator" shall include a contractor, supplier, service provider or a group or consortium of these'. (8)

7. Article 34 of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 provides, under the heading 'Entities to which public contracts may be awarded …':

'1. Without prejudice to the restrictions expressly provided for, the following entities are entitled to participate in the procedure for the award of public procurement contracts:

(a) individual commercial operators, including artisans, commercial companies and partnerships and cooperatives;

(b) consortia of production- and labour-cooperatives … and … consortia of artisans …;

(c) permanent consortia, constituted inter alia as joint venture companies ..., between individual contractors (including artisans), commercial companies or partnerships or production- and labour-cooperatives, …;

(d) special purpose groupings of competitors, whose members include the entities referred to in subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) …;

(e) ordinary consortia of competitors ..., whose members include the entities referred to in subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) of the present paragraph, including those constituted as companies or partnerships…;

(f) entities who have entered into an [EEIG] …;

8. It was only after the material events of the main proceedings had occurred, and therefore also after the adoption of the order of the referring court on 23 April 2008, that Legislative Decree No 152 of 11 September 2008 (9) added the following subparagraph to the above list: '(f bis) economic operators within the meaning of Article 3(22), established in other Member States and constituted according to the applicable legislation of the Member State concerned'.

II – Factual and procedural background and the questions referred

9. The Regione Marche (the Marche Region), in its capacity as a contracting authority, organised a public service tendering procedure in relation to the acquisition of geophysical data and marine samples. The Consorzio Nazionale Interuniversitario per le Scienze del Mare (National Inter-University Marine Sciences Consortium, 'CoNISMa') applied to participate, but was ultimately excluded from that procedure.

10. CoNISMa challenged its exclusion by way of an extraordinary petition to the President of the Italian Republic. In the framework of that extraordinary petition, the Ministero dell'ambiente e della tutela del territorio (Italian Ministry of the Environment and Protection of the Territory) requested an opinion of the Consiglio di Stato. The referring court needs to establish whether an inter-university group, such as CoNISMa, constitutes an 'economic operator' within the meaning of the Directive and, if so, whether it may take part in a tendering procedure such as the one at issue in the main proceedings. In that regard, the referring court expresses doubts on the basis of the following considerations.

11. The Consiglio di Stato states that CoNISMa is a group (consortium) of 24 universities and three ministries. According to its statute, the consortium is non-profit-making and seeks to promote and coordinate research and other scientific activities and their applications in the field of marine sciences between the member universities. However, its statute provides that it may participate in public tendering procedures. The consortium is financed primarily from funds provided by the Ministry for Universities and Research. In the referring court's view, the tendering procedures in question are open only to public bodies that supply the services which are the subject of the contract in accordance with their official functions and in a manner which is consistent with the profit-making functions they are assigned by the rules governing them.

12. Thus the Consiglio di Stato decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'(1) Must the provisions of Directive 2004/18/EC ... be interpreted as precluding a consortium made up solely of Italian universities and State bodies, [such as CoNISMa], from taking part in a tendering procedure for the award of a service contract such as that for the acquisition of geophysical data and marine samples?

(2) Are the provisions of Italian law contained in Article 3(22) and (19) and Article 34 of the Public Contracts Code, enacted by Legislative Decree No 163/2006, which provide, respectively: that "the term 'economic operator' shall include a contractor, supplier, service provider or a group or consortium of these" and "the terms 'contractor', 'supplier' and 'service provider' shall mean any natural or legal person, or body without legal personality, including [an EEIG] ..., which 'offers on the market', respectively, the execution of works or a work, the supply of products or the provision of services", contrary to Directive 2004/18/EC if interpreted as restricting participation in tendering procedures to professional providers of such services and excluding entities whose primary objects are non-profit-making, such as research?'

III – Assessment

A – Principal arguments of the parties

13. According to CoNISMa, the applicant in the main proceedings, the national legislation, which excludes entities that are not 'contractors' according to an exhaustive list contained in Article 34 of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, must be interpreted in the light of the Directive. Article 1(8) of the Directive expressly includes 'public entities' among contractors, suppliers or service providers. Article

4 of the Directive provides that candidates entitled to provide the relevant service are not to be rejected solely on the ground that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they would be required to be either natural or legal persons. A fortiori, a candidate should not be rejected on the ground that he is not a 'contractor'. CoNISMa states that that approach is confirmed by the fact that after the Commission of the European Communities had taken action in the form of opening administrative procedure No 2007/2309 (10) against the Italian Republic concerning a failure to fulfil obligations, the Italian Government inserted in Article 34(1) of Legislative Decree No 163/2006 the new subparagraph (f bis) referred to above. In CoNISMa's view, this reform expressly abolished the requirement that economic operators established in other Member States be a 'contractor'. Furthermore, that reform replaced the term 'undertakings' used in the Legislative Decree with the term 'economic operators'.

14. The Czech Government argues, in essence, that if the Directive intended to establish a distinction between economic public bodies, which carry out a certain economic activity, and non-economic ones, it would have included a statement to that effect. Therefore, the Czech Government proposes that the first question should be answered in the negative.

15. The Austrian Government contends inter alia that the Community rules on public procurement are applicable where a contracting authority intends to award a contract for pecuniary interest to a legally distinct entity, whether the latter is itself a contracting authority or not. It follows that contracting authorities may take part in public tendering procedures both as tenderers or as candidates, a point which should apply a fortiori to tenderers who are not contracting authorities but whose objects are non-profit-making and which do not act exclusively in accordance with market forces.

16. The Commission submits essentially that according to Article 1(8) of the Directive and the Court's case-law, public bodies and contracting authorities in general may take part in a public tendering procedure as tenderers and may therefore be considered as economic operators within the meaning of the Directive. Furthermore, no provision of the Directive precludes universities and consortia of universities from being considered economic operators and from accessing Community tender procedures.

17. As regards the second question, all the above parties argue, in substance, that it should be answered in the affirmative.

B – Appraisal

18. By its two questions, which should be considered together, the referring court asks essentially whether non-profit-making entities which are not necessarily present on the market on a regular basis, (11) such as CoNISMa – that is to say, universities and research institutes as well as groups (consortia) of those universities and research institutes and State bodies (12) – are entitled to participate in a public service tendering procedure and may be considered to constitute an 'economic operator' within the meaning of the Directive. Should the national legislation be interpreted restrictively as precluding the above entities from participating, the referring court asks whether such interpretation is contrary to the Directive. In that respect, it is sufficient to point out that the Court interprets Community law and not national law. (13)

19. I shall first consider the wording of the relevant provisions.

20. Despite the reference to 'economic operators' in, inter alia, Article 1(2)(a), the Directive does not contain a precise definition of that concept. Article 1(8) of the Directive provides only that that term 'is used merely in the interest of simplification' and means 'any natural or legal person or public entity or group of such persons and/or bodies which offers on the market … works[,] products or services'. (14)

21. In that regard, I consider that the fact that Article 1(8) of the Directive refers to those who 'offer services on the market' does not signify an intention to restrict the category of public bodies eligible to conclude contracts with contracting authorities solely to those bodies which are engaged (as an undertaking) in the activity involved in the service to be provided by the selected contractor and whose objects are profit-making. In order to be considered an economic operator it is not essential to offer services on the market on a continuous and systematic basis.

22. In my view, the Directive clearly does not require any particular legal form and it contains no requirement to the effect that an economic operator qualify as an undertaking or needs to have profit-making objects or a stable or regular presence on the market.

23. The Directive merely provides that an 'economic operator' means inter alia any public entity which offers on the market the execution of works, products or services. It says nothing more.

24. In that connection, as the Commission has pointed out, by not providing any indications as to the required characteristics and/or legal form of economic operators allowed to participate in tendering procedures, the Community legislature did not wish to define that concept in a way which would introduce particular conditions and thus limit access to tender procedures in such a way.

25. In addition, it should be pointed out that Article 4(1) of the Directive provides that 'candidates or tenderers who, under the law of the Member State in which they are established, are entitled to provide the relevant service, shall not be rejected solely on the ground that, under the law of the Member State in which the contract is awarded, they would be required to be either natural or legal persons'. Then, as regards groups of economic operators, Article 4(2) of the Directive continues that 'in order to submit a tender or a request to participate, these groups may not be required by the contracting authorities to assume a specific legal form …'.

26. It follows from the foregoing considerations, and not least from the wording of Article 1(8) of the Directive in particular, that public entities, such as the entity involved in the main proceedings, constitute 'economic operators' and may, in principle, participate in public service tendering procedures.

27. The above approach is confirmed by the travaux préparatoires to the Directive. (15)

28. Here, one may perhaps draw a parallel with the well-established concept of an undertaking under Community competition law.

29. This may also be opportune due to the fact that the Directive stresses that the concept of 'economic operator' is used merely in the interest of simplification. In addition, it is obvious that competition law and rules guaranteeing fair competition in tendering procedures are related.

30. Therefore it is instructive to recall the Höfner and Elser (16) line of case-law on the concept of 'undertaking', in the context of competition law, which 'encompasses every entity engaged in an economic activity, regardless of the legal status of the entity and the way in which it is financed'. Furthermore, the Court has held that 'any activity consisting in offering goods or services on a given market is an economic activity'. (17) Here, the remark of Advocate General Jacobs that 'an activity does not necessarily cease to be economic simply because there is no aim to make a profit' is particularly apt. (18)

31. My interpretation of the concept of 'economic operator' is also confirmed by the Court's case-law relating to public procurement.

32. First of all, there is case-law (19) where the Court has stated that the Community rules on public contracts apply to 'an economic operator [who is] active on the market'. However, I consider that one should not infer from that statement that an economic operator must have a stable or regular presence on the market.

33. On the contrary, in my view, the concept of 'economic operator' must be interpreted broadly in order to include any person who offers services on the market, whether he does so for the first time or merely on an isolated or occasional basis.

34. Indeed, as the Commission has pointed out, the above is not prejudicial to the quality of the service provided since Article 44 of the Directive provides that contracts are to be awarded only after the contracting authorities have checked the economic operators' economic and financial standing as well as their professional and technical knowledge or ability.

35. A broad interpretation of the concept of ‘economic operator’ is also in line with the Court’s case-law to the effect that it is the concern of Community law to ensure the widest possible participation by tenderers in a call for tenders. (20)

36. Regard should also be had in this context to the judgments in Teckal, (21) ARGE, (22)Stadt Halle and RPL Lochau, (23) and Auroux and Others, (24) where the Court ruled, inter alia, that Community legislation on public procurement is applicable even in cases where the contractor is itself a contracting authority. (25) Therefore, a contracting authority may also be considered to constitute an ‘economic operator’ within the meaning of the Directive. This also supports my broad interpretation of that concept in the present case.

37. The referring court expressed concerns specifically with regard to CoNISMa’s non-profit-making objects. In that connection, in Commission v Italy, (26) the Court ruled, first, that the fact that an association is non-profit-making does not exclude it from carrying out an activity of an economic nature and from constituting an undertaking under the Treaty provisions relating to competition.

38. Next, the Court recalled the ruling in ARGE (27) and held that the fact that, as their employees work on a voluntary basis, such bodies tend to be able to submit tenders at prices appreciably lower than those of other tenderers does not preclude them from participating in an award procedure for a public service contract covered by Directive 92/50. Therefore, the Court concluded that the contract at issue in that case was not excluded from the concept of public service contracts within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50, by reason of the fact that the associations at issue were of a non-profit-making nature. (28)

39. Furthermore, in order to address the referring court’s concerns that the consortium would allegedly not be able to offer the professionalism and capability of a typical business as well as the sophisticated machinery and highly-skilled operators required for the service concerned, it is sufficient to recall the case-law where the Court held that it makes no difference if the tenderer himself cannot or does not intend to carry out the contract itself provided that it can demonstrate that it actually has available to it the resources, of subsidiaries or third parties and whatever the nature of its legal link with those companies, (29) which are necessary for carrying out the contract.

40. In that connection, the Directive does not allow a contracting authority to exclude a public body, such as CoNISMa, from taking part in a tendering procedure, the reason being that the question whether an economic operator is entitled to take part in such a procedure is to be examined in the framework of Articles 44 to 52 of the Directive. In other words, as the Czech Government has argued, the possibility of taking part in a tendering procedure by way of submitting a bid should be distinguished from the assessment of that bid in the framework of a subsequent qualification phase of the procedure.

41. In addition, the referring court considers that participation in tendering procedures by consortia of public bodies, such as CoNISMa, may infringe the principle of free competition in two respects. First, such participation could potentially remove from the open market a number of public contracts, to which ease of access would be at least hampered for a not inconsiderable proportion of ordinary undertakings due to the consortium’s widespread network of business-referral points. Secondly, it would place the contractor in a position of unfair advantage because of the economic security provided by the constant and predictable flow of public finance which is not available to other economic operators, who must rely solely on their ability to earn revenue from their offering on the market.

42. First, as regards the alleged widespread network of business-referral points, I do not consider that argument particularly decisive, not least since CoNISMa explained in its observations that its only seat is in Rome and the offices of its various members do not play any role in public tendering procedures.

43. Secondly, with regard to the argument that CoNISMa would be placed in a position of unfair advantage because of the public finance available to it – quite apart from CoNISMa’s explanation that its commercial activity is self-funding – I agree with the Czech Government and the Commission that it is sufficient to refer to the Court’s case-law to the effect that that element is not an obstacle to participation in tendering procedures. (30) In particular, the Court has held that public bodies, specifically bodies receiving subsidies from the State which might enable them to submit tenders at prices appreciably lower than those of other, unsubsidised, tenderers, are expressly authorised (31) to participate in a procedure for the award of a public procurement contract. Indeed, the Directive which is pertinent in the case in the main proceedings also expressly authorises public bodies, funded in some cases out of the public purse, to participate in procedures for the award of public procurement contracts.

44. It may be noted here that Article 55(3) of the Directive concerning 'abnormally low tenders' provides that 'where a contracting authority establishes that a tender is abnormally low because the tenderer has obtained State aid, the tender can be rejected on that ground alone only after consultation with the tenderer where the latter is unable to prove, within a sufficient time-limit fixed by the contracting authority, that the aid in question was granted legally. Where the contracting authority rejects a tender in these circumstances, it shall inform the Commission of that fact'. (32)

45. In that regard, the Directive states, in the fourth recital in the preamble, that 'Member States should ensure that the participation of a body governed by public law as a tenderer in a procedure for the award of a public contract does not cause any distortion of competition in relation to private tenderers'.

46. To conclude, Article 1(8) of the Directive, and in particular the concept of 'economic operator', should be interpreted as not precluding a consortium such as the one in the main proceedings from taking part in a public service tendering procedure. (33) It follows that the Directive precludes national legislation which excludes such entities from participation, provided that they are otherwise entitled under the relevant national legislation to offer products, services or works on the market.

47. In that regard, it is for the national court to determine, taking into account all the relevant circumstances of the case before it, whether the relevant national legislation is compatible with the Directive, disapplying, if necessary, any contrary provision of domestic law. (34)

IV – Conclusion

48. Therefore, I suggest that the Court answer the questions of the Consiglio di Stato as follows:

(1) Article 1(8) of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts, and in particular the concept of 'economic operator', should be interpreted as not precluding a consortium, such as the one in the main proceedings, from taking part in a tendering procedure for the award of a service contract pertaining to services the consortium is entitled to carry out under the relevant national legislation.

(2) Directive 2004/18 precludes national legislation which excludes entities whose primary objects are non-profit-making, such as research, from participating in tendering procedures, provided that those entities are entitled under the relevant national legislation to offer works, products or services on the market.

10 – CoNISMa claims that the Commission criticised the list in Article 34 of Legislative Decree No 163/2006, stating that it ‘does not appear to allow the participation in tendering procedures of operators with a legal form different to those mentioned in the list. In particular, this article does not appear to allow the participation of other public entities or bodies governed by public law in the sense of the public procurement directives’.

---

11 – The Consiglio di Stato refers in this respect to CoNISMa’s presence on the market as not being on a ‘regular’ or ‘stable’ basis. However, CoNISMa’s statute expressly provides that it may participate in tendering procedures and that is why I qualify the statement with the inclusion of ‘necessarily’. In fact, CoNISMa argues that it regularly participates in public tendering procedures.

---

12 – I would note here that CoNISMa disputes the fact that it is also composed of State bodies. However, suffice it to say that the questions referred for a preliminary ruling are considered within the factual and legal context as set out by the referring court. The Court does not take account of observations from interested parties within the meaning of Article 23 of the Statute of the Court which take issue with that context. See Case C-153/02 Neri [2003] ECR I-13555, paragraphs 33 to 36; see also Case C-145/03 Keller [2005] ECR I-2529, paragraphs 32 to 34. In any event, my conclusion in the present opinion applies whether or not the consortium is also composed of State bodies.

13 – As regards the wording of the second question, it is not the task of the Court, in preliminary ruling proceedings, to rule upon the compatibility of national law with Community law or to interpret national law. The Court is, however, competent to give the national court full guidance on the interpretation of Community law in order to enable it to determine the issue of compatibility for the purposes of the case before it (see Case C-213/07 Michaniki [2008] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 51 and 52 and the case-law cited).

---

14 – Emphasis added.

---

15 – The proposal for the Directive explained, under ‘justification’ for the wording of what eventually became Article 1(8), that the ‘new concept [of an economic operator] has become necessary because of the insertion of the three public sector Directives into a single text’. The travaux préparatoires to the Directive also state that ‘the only purpose of [that] term is for conciseness’ and that it stands for ‘opérateur économique’ in French or ‘ondernemer’ in Dutch and that in English it effectively means ‘undertaking’. They continue by stating that ‘in the event of serious transcription problems, systematic use could be made, despite the ponderous style, of “supplier, provider of services and contractor”’.

32 – In this respect, see also ARGE, cited in footnote 22.

33 – In that connection, as the Commission has pointed out, a Member State may of course govern the activities of non-profit-making persons whose primary object is research and, if necessary, may limit the possibility for such persons to offer services on the market. None the less, the Member State in question must recognise persons established in other Member States entitled under the law of the Member States concerned to carry out the relevant service activity as constituting ‘economic operators’, whether they be universities, research institutes or groups made up of these, acting with or without a profit-making purpose. The referring court does not refer to any Italian legislation which would establish the above limitations for entities such as the one in the main proceedings.

34 – See, to that effect, Case C-357/06 Frigerio Luigi & C. [2007] ECR I-12311, paragraph 28, which refers to Case 157/86 Murphy and Others [1988] ECR 673, paragraph 11, and Case C-208/05 ITC [2007] ECR I-181, paragraphs 68 and 69.

10 December 2009 (*)

(Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations – Directive 2004/18/EC – Procedures for the award of public contracts – National legislation providing for a single procedure for the award of the contract defining needs and of the ensuing marché d'exécution – Compatibility with that directive)

In Case C-299/08,

ACTION under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, brought on 4 July 2008,

European Commission, represented initially by D. Kukovec and G. Rozet, and subsequently by G. Rozet and M. Konstantinidis, acting as Agents, with an address for service in Luxembourg, applicant,

v

French Republic, represented by G. de Bergues, J.-C. Gracia and J.-S. Pilczer, acting as Agents, defendant,

THE COURT (Third Chamber), composed of J.N. Cunha Rodrigues (Rapporteur), President of the Second Chamber, acting as President of the Third Chamber, P. Lindh, A. Rosas, U. Lõhmus and A. Arabadjiev, Judges,

Advocate General: J. Mazák,

Registrar: R. Şereş, Administrator,

having regard to the written procedure and further to the hearing on 10 June 2009, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 22 September 2009,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By its application, the Commission of the European Communities is asking the Court to declare that, by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Code des marchés publics (the Public Procurement Code) adopted by Decree No 2006-975 of 1 August 2006 (Official Journal of the French Republic of 4 August 2006, p. 11627), inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of so-called marchés de definition (public contracts for designing the parameters, including the purpose, of a public works, supply or service contract) under which it is possible for the contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution (a public works, supply or service contract) to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition without opening it afresh to competition or, at most, by opening it to competition limited to those holders, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2, 28 and 31 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114).

Legal context

Community legislation

2 Recital 3 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 states:

‘Such [Community] coordinating provisions [of national procedures for the award of contracts] should comply as far as possible with current procedures and practices in each of the Member States.’

3 Article 2 of the Directive provides:

‘Contracting authorities shall treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and shall act in a transparent way.’

4 According to Article 28 of the Directive:

‘In awarding their public contracts, contracting authorities shall apply the national procedures adjusted for the purposes of this Directive.

They shall award these public contracts by applying the open or restricted procedure. In the specific circumstances expressly provided for in Article 29, contracting authorities may award their public contracts by means of the competitive dialogue. In the specific cases and circumstances referred to expressly in Articles 30 and 31, they may apply a negotiated procedure, with or without publication of the contract notice.’

5 Article 29 of Directive 2004/18, entitled ‘Competitive dialogue’, provides:

‘1. In the case of particularly complex contracts, Member States may provide that where contracting authorities consider that the use of the open or restricted procedure will not allow the award of the contract, the latter may make use of the competitive dialogue in accordance with this Article.

A public contract shall be awarded on the sole basis of the award criterion for the most economically advantageous tender.

2. Contracting authorities shall publish a contract notice setting out their needs and requirements, which they shall define in that notice and/or in a descriptive document.

3. Contracting authorities shall open, with the candidates selected in accordance with the relevant provisions of Articles 44 to 52, a dialogue the aim of which shall be to identify and define the means best suited to satisfying their needs. They may discuss all aspects of the contract with the chosen candidates during this dialogue.

During the dialogue, contracting authorities shall ensure equality of treatment among all tenderers. In particular, they shall not provide information in a discriminatory manner which may give some tenderers an advantage over others.

Contracting authorities may not reveal to the other participants solutions proposed or other confidential information communicated by a candidate participating in the dialogue without his/her agreement.

4. Contracting authorities may provide for the procedure to take place in successive stages in order to reduce the number of solutions to be discussed during the dialogue stage by applying the award criteria in the contract notice or the descriptive document. The contract notice or the descriptive document shall indicate that recourse may be had to this option.

5. The contracting authority shall continue such dialogue until it can identify the solution or solutions, if necessary after comparing them, which are capable of meeting its needs.

6. Having declared that the dialogue is concluded and having so informed the participants, contracting authorities shall ask them to submit their final tenders on the basis of the solution or solutions presented and specified during the dialogue. These tenders shall contain all the elements required and necessary for the performance of the project.

These tenders may be clarified, specified and fine-tuned at the request of the contracting authority. However, such clarification, specification, fine-tuning or additional information may not involve changes to the basic features of the tender or the call for tender, variations in which are likely to distort competition or have a discriminatory effect.

7. Contracting authorities shall assess the tenders received on the basis of the award criteria laid down in the contract notice or the descriptive document and shall choose the most economically advantageous tender in accordance with Article 53.

At the request of the contracting authority, the tenderer identified as having submitted the most economically advantageous tender may be asked to clarify aspects of the tender or confirm commitments contained in the tender provided this does not have the effect of modifying substantial aspects of the tender or of the call for tender and does not risk distorting competition or causing discrimination.

8. The contracting authorities may specify prices or payments to the participants in the dialogue.'

6 Article 31 of Directive 2004/18 states:

'Contracting authorities may award public contracts by a negotiated procedure without prior publication of a contract notice in the following cases:

(3) for public service contracts, when the contract concerned follows a design contest and must, under the applicable rules, be awarded to the successful candidate or to one of the successful candidates[;] in the latter case, all successful candidates must be invited to participate in the negotiations;

…'

7 The first subparagraph of Article 80(1) of the Directive is worded as follows:

'The Member States shall bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive no later than 31 January 2006. They shall forthwith inform the Commission thereof.'

National legislation

8 The code des marchés publics (Public Procurement Code), in the version thereof resulting from Decree No 2004-15 of 7 January 2004 (Official Journal of the French Republic of 8 January 2004, p. 703), which entered into force on 10 January 2004, provided in the third paragraph of Article 73 as follows:

'Provisions supplied under several marchés de définitions having the same subject-matter, concluded upon completion of a single procedure and awarded simultaneously, may be awarded, without a further tendering process, to the supplier of the chosen solution. In such cases, the amount of the provisions to be compared with the thresholds takes account of the cost of the definition studies and the estimated amount of the marché d'exécution.'

9 The Public Procurement Code, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, which entered into force on 1 September 2006, contains inter alia the following provisions:

'Article 73

If the public entity is unable to specify the aims and performances which the contract must meet, the techniques to be used, and the human and material resources required, it may resort to marchés de definition.

The purpose of such contracts is to explore the possibilities and conditions for establishing a contract subsequently, if necessary through production of a model or demonstrator. They must also enable the price level of the provisions to be estimated and calculated, as well as the different phases of the performance schedule.

In the framework of a single procedure, contracts for the performance of services following several marchés de définition having the same subject-matter and awarded simultaneously are awarded after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the initial marchés de définition, in accordance with the following provisions:

1. The public contract notice defines the subject-matter of the marchés de définition awarded simultaneously and the subject-matter of the subsequent marché d'exécution;

2. The public contract notice defines the criteria for the selection of applications. Those criteria take into account the capacities and competences required of the candidates both for the marchés de définition and for the subsequent marché d'exécution;

3. The public contract notice defines the criteria for the selection of offers for the marchés de définition awarded simultaneously and the criteria for the selection of offers for the subsequent marché d'exécution;

4. The amount of the provisions to be compared with the thresholds takes account of the cost of the definition studies and the estimated amount of the marché d'exécution;

5. The number of marchés de définition awarded simultaneously in the framework of the present procedure may not be lower than three, subject to a sufficient number of candidates.

The contract or framework agreement is awarded by the tenders committee for the local authorities or after the opinion of the tenders committee for the State, for the public health bodies and the public social or medical-social bodies.'

IV. In the framework of a single procedure, the contract or framework agreement of project-management following several marchés de définition having the same subject-matter and awarded simultaneously may be awarded after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the initial marchés de définition, under the conditions laid down in the third paragraph of Article 73.

The pre-litigation procedure

10 By letter of 18 October 2004, the Commission sent the French Republic a first letter of formal notice concerning Articles 73 and 74-III of the Public Procurement Code, as amended by Decree No 2004-15. Following the amendment of those provisions by Decree No 2006-975, the Commission sent an additional letter of formal notice to that Member State on 15 December 2006.

11 As it was not satisfied with the French Republic's replies, on 29 June 2007 the Commission sent a reasoned opinion to the French Republic, calling on it to take the measures necessary to comply with that opinion within two months of its receipt.

12 Taking the view that that Member State's replies to the reasoned opinion were not satisfactory, the Commission decided to bring the present action.

The action

Arguments of the parties

13 The Commission claims that Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Public Procurement Code, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, allow a contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution (a public works, supply or service contract) to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition without opening it afresh to competition or, at most, by opening it to competition limited to those holders as soon as the conditions provided for in the third paragraph of Article 73 have been met. Those articles of the Public Procurement Code infringe the provisions of Directive 2004/18 by allowing a contract to be awarded on the basis of mutual agreement, or with limited competition, in situations not provided for by the Directive.

14 The Commission maintains that marchés de définition as provided for by those national provisions do not make it possible, as a general rule, to establish at the outset, with sufficient precision, the subject-matter of the marché d'exécution, the criteria for selecting tenderers or those for awarding the contract in question. It follows that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition resulting from those provisions runs counter to the principle of transparency laid down in Article 2 of Directive 2004/18. That procedure creates a situation of legal uncertainty for both contracting authorities and operators.

15 According to the Commission, the procedure for the award of marchés de définition is neither a competitive dialogue nor a framework agreement within the meaning of Articles 29 and 32 of Directive 2004/18. Nor is such a procedure a design contest under which it is possible, under certain conditions, to award the ensuing service contract on the basis of mutual agreement in accordance with Article 31(3) of the Directive.

16 The French Republic claims that the national provisions in issue are not incompatible with Articles 2, 28 or 31 of Directive 2004/18. The latter, it argues, is a coordinating directive and does not lay down a uniform and exhaustive body of Community rules. Consequently, the fact that competition may be limited when the marchés d'exécution are being awarded is compatible with that directive. The procedure for the award of marchés de définition complies with the principles on the right of establishment and the freedom to provide services laid down by the EC Treaty and set out in Article 2 of that directive, since the Member States remain free to maintain or adopt substantive and procedural rules in regard to public contracts.

17 The French Republic argues that it is possible for the subject-matter and criteria of the subsequent marché d'exécution to be established from the launch of the procedure for the award of the marchés de définition. There are many situations, such as those involving certain urban development contracts, in which the subject-matter and criteria for the award of the marché d'exécution are sufficiently independent of the marchés de définition that they can already be determined at the initial stage of the marchés de définition.

18 The French Republic adds that Directive 2004/18 sets out two procedures with characteristics which are analogous to those of the procedure for the award of marchés de definition provided for by the Public Procurement Code, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, namely the framework agreement and the competitive dialogue. By those two procedures, the Community legislature itself established complex procedures by which contracts are opened to competition in two stages. Since that directive does not lay down a uniform and exhaustive body of Community rules, the national legislature can also establish specific provisions providing for contracts to be opened to competition in two stages, provided that those provisions comply with the principle of transparency laid down in Article 2 of that directive.

19 If the Court were to take the view that the body of rules established by that directive is exhaustive, the French Republic submits, in the alternative, that the procedure for the award of marchés de definition set out in the Public Procurement Code can be regarded as constituting a variation on the competitive dialogue procedure.

Findings of the Court

20 By its form of order, the Commission is asking the Court to declare that the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2, 28 and 31 of Directive 2004/18 by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Public Procurement Code adopted by Decree No 2006-975, inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of marchés de definition under which it is possible for a contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition 'without opening it afresh to competition' or, at most, by opening it to competition limited to those holders.

21 It is appropriate to examine the alleged failure to fulfil obligations under Article 31 of Directive 2004/18. According to the Commission, that failure stems from the fact that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition allows contracts to be awarded on the basis of mutual agreement in circumstances which are not provided for by point 3 of Article 31 of the Directive.

22 In this respect, it is settled case-law that the question whether a Member State has failed to fulfil obligations must be determined by reference to the situation prevailing in that Member State at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion (see, inter alia, Case C-64/01 Commission v Greece [2002] ECR I-2523, paragraph 7, and Case C-456/05 Commission v Germany [2007] ECR I-10517, paragraph 15).

23 It is common ground that the version of Article 73 of the Public Procurement Code resulting from Decree No 2004-15 which allowed marchés d'exécution to be awarded 'without a further tendering process' was no longer in force on the date of expiry of the two-month period laid down in the reasoned opinion. On that date, that version of Article 73 had been replaced by a new version resulting from Decree No 2006-975.

24 It is clear from the wording of the third paragraph of Article 73 of the Public Procurement Code, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, that marchés d'exécution are awarded solely 'after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the initial marchés de définition'. On the date on which the period laid down in the reasoned opinion expired, marchés d'exécution were thus not awarded by means of the negotiated procedure within the meaning of point 3 of Article 31 of Directive 2004/18.

25 It follows that the Commission's action must be dismissed in so far as it seeks a declaration by the Court that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition allows a contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution to one of the holders of the marchés de définition 'without opening it afresh to competition' and in so far as it claims that there has been a failure to fulfil obligations under Article 31 of that directive.

26 The action does, however, retain a purpose in so far as the Commission complains that the French Republic has failed in its obligations under Articles 2 and 28 of Directive 2004/18 by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Public Procurement Code adopted by Decree No 2006-975, inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of marchés de definition under which it is possible for the contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition by opening it to competition limited to those holders.

27 In its statement in defence, the French Republic submits that Directive 2004/18 is only a coordinating directive, which leaves Member States free to maintain or adopt rules in regard to public contracts other than those provided for by that directive.

28 That line of argument cannot be accepted. Whilst it is true that Directive 2004/18 does not seek to establish complete harmonisation of the rules governing public procurement in the Member States, the fact remains that the procedures for the award of public contracts that the Member States are permitted to use are listed exhaustively in Article 28 of that directive.

29 Under Article 28, contracting authorities are required to award their public contracts by applying either the open or restricted procedure, or, in the specific circumstances expressly provided for in Article 29 of Directive 2004/18, the competitive dialogue or, in the further alternative, in the specific circumstances referred to expressly in Articles 30 and 31 thereof, a negotiated procedure. The award of public contracts by means of other procedures is not permitted by that directive.

30 A different conclusion cannot be inferred from Joined Cases 27/86 to 29/86 CEI and Bellini [1987] ECR 3347.

31 Admittedly, in the first sentence of paragraph 15 of that judgment, the Court held that Council Directive 71/305/EEC of 26 July 1971 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682) did not lay down a uniform and exhaustive body of Community rules. However, in the following sentence of that paragraph 15, the Court stated that, although Member States remained free to maintain or adopt substantive and procedural rules in regard to public contracts, they had to do so within the framework of the common rules contained in that directive.

32 Furthermore, in paragraph 17 of CEI and Bellini, the Court made it clear that it was ruling in the light of the state of harmonisation of Community law at the time of delivery of its judgment. However, the second paragraph of Article 28 of Directive 2004/18, which had no equivalent in Directive 71/305, specifically lists the procedures which contracting authorities must apply in awarding their contracts.

33 It follows that, in the framework of the common rules currently in force, Member States are no longer free to adopt award procedures other than those specified by Directive 2004/18.

34 Accordingly, the French Republic's arguments that it is possible for a Member State to adopt contract award procedures which are not provided for by Directive 2004/18, but which exhibit characteristics analogous to those of certain procedures referred to by that directive, must be rejected.

35 However, it is necessary to examine the argument, put forward by the French Republic in the alternative, that the procedure for the award of marchés de definition provided for by the Public Procurement Code, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, constitutes a form of implementation of the competitive dialogue procedure provided for in Article 29 of Directive 2004/18.

36 It must be acknowledged that there is a degree of proximity between the objectives pursued by the competitive dialogue procedure and those of the procedure for the award of marchés de definition. Each of those procedures was designed to enable the contracting authority to define initially the specific subject-matter of a contract and the technical means for performing it.

37 However, there is a fundamental difference between those two procedures. The difference is that the competitive dialogue is a procedure for the award of one single contract, whereas the procedure for the award of marchés de définition relates to the award of several contracts of different natures, namely marchés de définition, on the one hand, and one or more marché d'exécution, on the other.

38 That difference by itself makes it impossible for the procedure for the award of marchés de definition to be interpreted as a form of implementation of the competitive dialogue procedure.

39 The Commission also pleads a failure to fulfil obligations under Article 2 of Directive 2004/18, which requires contracting authorities to treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and to act in a transparent way.

40 In this respect, the Court notes that the purpose of the procedure for the award of marchés de definition, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, is to award two types of contracts, namely marchés de définition and marchés d'exécution, the latter being awarded after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the former alone. Accordingly, economic operators who might be interested in participating in marchés d'exécution, but who are not holders of one of the marchés de définition, are discriminated against in comparison with those holders, contrary to the principle of equality, which is laid down as a principle for the award of contracts in Article 2 of Directive 2004/18.

41 Moreover, both the principle of equal treatment and the obligation of transparency which flows from it require the subject-matter of each contract and the criteria governing its award to be clearly defined (see, to that effect, Case C-340/02 Commission v France [2004] ECR I-9845, paragraph 34).

42 The French Republic has put forward a number of examples of procedures for the award of marchés de definition in which, in its view, the subject-matter of the marché d'exécution could be defined with a certain degree of precision already at the stage of the launch of the procedure for the award of the marchés de définition.

43 However, marchés de définition and marchés d'exécution appear by their nature to have different subject-matters, namely, first, a study and design project in which the needs of the contracting authority are defined and, second, the actual provision of supplies, services or works defined in advance. The national provisions the subject of complaint are not, however, capable of ensuring that, in all cases, the subject-matter and award criteria of both marchés de définition and the marché d'exécution can be defined from the beginning of the procedure.

44 It follows that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition laid down by Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Public Procurement Code, as adopted by Decree No 2006-975, is not consistent with Article 2 of Directive 2004/18.

45 Consequently, by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Public Procurement Code, adopted by Decree No 2006-975 of 1 August 2006, inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of marchés de definition under which it is possible for the contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution (a public works, supply or service contract) to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition by opening it to competition limited to those holders, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2 and 28 of Directive 2004/18.

Costs

46 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has applied for costs to be awarded against the French Republic and the latter has, in essence, been unsuccessful, the French Republic must be ordered to pay the costs.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby:

1. Declares that, by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Public Procurement Code, adopted by Decree No 2006-975 of 1 August 2006, inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of marchés de definition (public contracts for designing the parameters, including the purpose, of a public works, supply or service contract) under which it is possible for the contracting authority to award a marché d'exécution (a public works, supply or service contract) to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition by opening it to competition limited to those holders, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2 and 28 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts;

2. Dismisses the remainder of the action;

3. Orders the French Republic to pay the costs.

OPINION OF ADVOCATE GENERAL
Mazák
delivered on 22 September 2009 (1)

Case C-299/08

Commission of the European Communities
French Republic

(Failure of a Member State to fulfil its obligations – Directive 2004/18/EC – Public procurement – Use of the negotiated procedure without publication of a contract notice in situations not provided for in the directive – Distinction between marchés de définition and public works, supply or service contracts)

1. By its present action, brought under Article 226 EC, the Commission is asking the Court to declare that, by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Code des marchés publics (2) ('the contested provisions'), inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of so-called marchés de définition (3) under which it is possible for the contracting authority to award an ulterior marché d'exécution (a public works, supply or service contract) to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition without opening it afresh to competition or, at most, by opening it to competition limited to those holders, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2, 28 and 31 of Directive 2004/18/EC. (4)

I – Legal context

A – Community law

2. Article 2 of the Directive provides under 'Principles of awarding contracts' that 'contracting authorities shall treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and shall act in a transparent way'.

3. Article 28 of the Directive, under 'Use of open, restricted and negotiated procedures and of competitive dialogue', provides:

'In awarding their public contracts, contracting authorities shall apply the national procedures adjusted for the purposes of this Directive.

They shall award these public contracts by applying the open or restricted procedure. In the specific circumstances expressly provided for in Article 29, contracting authorities may award their public contracts by means of the competitive dialogue. In the specific cases and circumstances referred to expressly in Articles 30 and 31, they may apply a negotiated procedure, with or without publication of the contract notice.'

4. The Member States had to bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with the Directive no later than 31 January 2006.

B – National law

5. The CMP 2006, which entered into force on 1 September 2006, provides inter alia as follows:

‘Article 73

If the public entity is unable to specify the aims and performances the contract must meet, the techniques to be used, and the human and material resources required, it may resort to marchés de définition.

The purpose of such contracts is to explore the possibilities and conditions for establishing a contract subsequently, if necessary through production of a model or demonstrator. They must also enable the price level of the provisions to be estimated and calculated, as well as the different phases of the performance schedule.

In the framework of a single procedure, the performance of the contract following several marchés de définition having the same subject-matter and awarded simultaneously are awarded after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the initial marchés de définition, in accordance with the following provisions:

1 The public contract notice defines the subject-matter of the marchés de définition awarded simultaneously and the subject-matter of the subsequent marché d’exécution;

2 The public contract notice defines the criteria for the selection of applications. Those criteria take into account the capacities and competences required of the candidates both for the marchés de définition and for the subsequent marché d’exécution;

3 The public contract notice defines the criteria for the selection of offers for the marchés de définition awarded simultaneously and the criteria for the selection of offers for the subsequent marché d’exécution;

4 The amount of the provisions to be compared with the thresholds takes account of the cost of the definition studies and the estimated amount of the fulfilment contract;

5 The number of marchés de définition awarded simultaneously in the framework of the present procedure may not be lower than three, subject to a sufficient number of candidates.

The contract or framework agreement is awarded by the tenders committee for the local authorities or after the opinion of the tenders committee for the State, for the public health bodies and the public social or medical-social bodies.’

‘Article 74

IV. In the framework of a single procedure, the contract or framework agreement of project-management following several marchés de définition having the same subject-matter and awarded simultaneously may be awarded after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the initial marchés de définition, under the conditions laid down in the third paragraph of Article 73.’

II – Procedure

6. On 18 October 2004, the Commission sent the French Republic a first letter of formal notice and on 12 December 2006, it sent an additional letter of formal notice. As the Commission was not satisfied with the French Republic’s replies, it issued a reasoned opinion on 27 June 2007. Since the Commission considered that the failure to fulfil obligations was persisting and it was not satisfied with the replies it received, the Commission decided to bring this action. Both parties submitted oral argument at the hearing, which took place on 10 June 2009.

III – Assessment

A – Principal arguments of the parties

7. The Commission submits that France permits the award of contracts on the basis of mutual agreement, or with limited competition, in situations not provided for by the Directive. In the Commission's view, it is impossible by definition for the subject-matter and criteria for the award of a public procurement contract to be known precisely at a moment where the project has not yet been defined and where the marchés de définition have not yet been executed. The marché de définition and the marché d'exécution are two entirely distinct types of public procurement contract and may not be awarded by way of a single procedure. According to the Commission, the procedure for the award of marchés de définition comes neither under the competitive dialogue nor under the framework agreement within the meaning of Articles 29 and 32 of the Directive and it cannot be analysed as a derivation of the competitive dialogue.

8. The French Government submits that the contested provisions are not incompatible with the Directive, which is merely a coordinating directive. In its view, it is possible for the subject-matter and criteria of the ulterior marché d'exécution to be established from the launch of the marchés de définition. Furthermore, the French Government submits that the Directive has foreseen two procedures with characteristics analogous to those of the French procedure for the award of marchés de définition – the framework agreement and the competitive dialogue. Thus the Community legislature itself instituted complex procedures where contracts are opened to competition in two stages, without however being exhaustive.

B – Appraisal

1. General remarks

9. The Commission argues that, by drawing a distinction between marchés de définition and marchés d'exécution and by allowing, in certain circumstances, the award of the latter to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition without again opening them to competition or, at the very least, by opening them to competition limited only to those holders, the French legislation disregards the fundamental principles of equality and transparency inherent to the Directive. Here it should be pointed out that the argument concerning the marchés de définition not being opened to any competition would appear to pertain to the wording of the provisions in the CMP 2004. (5) Thus, I will consider the Commission's argument as it pertains to the contested provisions – that is to say the CMP 2006 which was meant to transpose the Directive into national law – to the effect that these open the marchés d'exécution to competition limited only to holders of the initial marchés de définition and that in situations not provided for by the Directive.

2. On the exhaustive nature of Article 28 of the Directive

10. In that regard, in their submissions the parties have discussed at length whether or not the list of procedures for the award of public contracts, contained in Article 28 of the Directive, is exhaustive in nature since it clearly does not make provision for the marchés de définition.

11. Here the French Government argues that, in view of the third recital in the preamble to the Directive and Article 28, the Directive did not mean to abolish all the specific national procedures. Referring to the Court's ruling in CEI and Others, (6) concerning Council Directive 71/305/EEC, (7) the French Government claims that 'the Member States remain free to maintain or adopt substantive and procedural rules in regard to public … contracts on condition that they comply with all the relevant provisions of Community law and, in particular, the prohibitions flowing from the principles laid down in the Treaty in regard to the right of establishment and the freedom to provide services'. (8)

12. Indeed, it is quite clear from the title of the Directive and from the second and third recitals in its preamble that the Directive's aim is to coordinate national procedures for the award of public contracts. Therefore, it does not lay down a uniform and exhaustive body of Community rules on the matter. Hence, within the framework of the common rules which it contains, the Member States remain free to maintain or adopt substantive and procedural rules in regard to public contracts on condition that they comply with all the relevant provisions of Community law. However, the fact that the Directive has not brought about a complete harmonisation of the rules governing procedures for the award of public contracts does not mean that some of its provisions should not be understood as having exhaustively regulated certain matters.

13. First, suffice it to note that the French Government cannot rely on the CEI and Others case-law because Article 28 of Directive 2004/18 substantially differs from Article 2 of Directive 71/305 – the Community legislature has complemented Article 28 of the Directive with a completely new second paragraph which plays a decisive role for the case at hand.

14. Secondly, there are certain factors which convincingly suggest that the procedures referred to in Article 28 of the Directive are to be regarded as exhaustive. In general, the wording of that paragraph exhibits none of the features to be observed in what is commonly known as an open list. On the contrary, that paragraph enumerates not only the two standard procedures but also two exceptional procedures thus leaving no room for another kind of interpretative completion of the list of procedures. Nor does the Directive as a whole contain any provision which would allow such a completion.

15. As I will explain below, the procedure for the award of marchés de définition clearly differs from the procedures set out in the Directive and cannot be assimilated to any provision of the Directive. In fact, the French Government explicitly recognised in its defence and in its rejoinder that the marchés de définition have not been provided for in the Directive.

16. The procedures which the Directive does provide for are the following. As is clear from the second paragraph of Article 28 of the Directive, the Community legislature has set out two procedures which should, as a general rule, be followed by contracting authorities. These are the open and the restricted procedures and they may be referred to as standard or normal procedures. Next, the competitive dialogue may be considered to constitute a special or exceptional procedure whose implementation and conditions are specified in Article 29 of the Directive. (9) Likewise, the negotiated procedure, with or without publication of the contract notice, may be considered as special or exceptional in nature with conditions specified in Articles 30 and 31 of the Directive. (10)

17. However, the French Government submits that, in fact, there are certain specific award procedures provided for by the Directive in Chapter V under ‘Procedures’ which are not mentioned in Article 28 of the Directive. The French Government refers to framework agreements, dynamic purchasing systems and public works contracts: particular rules on subsidised housing schemes. These are provided for in Articles 32, 33 and 34 of the Directive respectively.

18. In that regard, first, framework agreements and dynamic purchasing systems constitute specific forms of contracts or variations of existing procedures. They are not distinct new forms of award procedures for public contracts which are, as such, provided for in Article 28 of the Directive. In addition, it follows from the wording of Articles 32(2) and 33(2) of the Directive that the contracting authorities are obliged to follow the rules of procedure referred to in Article 28 of the Directive. Secondly, with regard to the rules on subsidised housing schemes, the title of Article 34 clearly shows it concerns ‘particular rules’ and not rules of procedure as such. Rather, it constitutes an exception to the provisions pertaining to the general procedure. Indeed, the very existence of Article 34 of the Directive and of the particular rules which it sets out would militate in favour of the view that the list of award procedures in Chapter V of the Directive should be considered to be exhaustive.

19. In this context it may be noted in passing that in its submissions the French Government also argues the merits and the raison d’être of the procedure for the award of marchés de définition notably with regard to complex contracts where contracting authorities are ‘unable to specify the aims and performances the contract must meet, the techniques to be used, and the ... resources required’. (11) It is apparent from the travaux préparatoires for the Directive that the Community legislature was aware of such concerns. (12) As a result, the Community legislature did include among the award procedures for public contracts a new procedure in the form of the competitive dialogue but it did not decide to include the procedure for the award of marchés de définition. (13)

20. In addition, the French Government also tries to defend its case by arguing that the marchés de définition should be considered analogous to two procedures which are provided for in the Directive – the framework agreement and the competitive dialogue. As regards the former, its opening to competition may be divided into two stages where the last stage is open to competition limited to the successful holders of the first contract and which allows it to further specify the terms of the second contract. As regards the latter, the procedure for the award of marchés de définition allows a contracting authority to draw up the conditions of a contract whose selection criteria had been established. Thus, according to the French Government, the Community legislature instituted complex procedures where contracts are opened to competition in two stages, without however being exhaustive.

21. That argumentation shall not prosper. Suffice it to point out that it is not disputed by the French Government that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition comes neither under the competitive dialogue nor under the framework agreement within the meaning of Articles 29 and 32 of the Directive. Competitive dialogue and framework agreements are forms of contracts subject to specific provisions. Recognising their specificity, the Community legislature provided for rules which guarantee that principles set out in Article 2 of the Directive remain respected.

22. Should the list in Article 28 of the Directive be held to be exhaustive, the French Government submits, in the alternative, that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition should be analysed as a derivation of the competitive dialogue procedure. It would appear that the French Government raised this argument in the alternative for the first time in its defence before the Court. Prior to that that government had defended the opposite thesis to the effect that marchés de définition did not come under the competitive dialogue procedure and were not provided for by the Directive. Indeed, those very submissions have raised numerous differences between the two procedures. In any event, I consider that that argument is not helpful to the French Government's case. Suffice it to point out that the two procedures differ in important aspects, not least because the competitive dialogue is a procedure for the award of a single contract, while the procedure for the award of marchés de définition is aimed at awarding two contracts where the second is awarded after being opened to competition limited to the holders of the initial contract.

3. Treating economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and in a transparent way

23. In any event, even if we were to accept the consideration that one may, under certain conditions, adjust the procedures enumerated in Article 28 of the Directive, having regard to the nature and functioning of the procedure for the award of marchés de définition, it is to be noted that this procedure not only cannot be classified under Article 28 of the Directive but is contrary to the principles referred to in the second recital in the preamble to the Directive and in Article 2 of the Directive. (14)

24. Contrary to what the French Government argues, in my view the Commission is correct when it submits that it is virtually impossible by definition for the subject-matter and criteria for the award of a public procurement contract (marché d'exécution) to be known precisely at a moment where the project has not yet been defined and where the marchés de définition have not yet been executed. The marchés de définition and the marché d'exécution are two entirely distinct types of public procurement contract, which, it would appear, has never been contested by the French Government. Each has its own subject-matter and award criteria and, on those grounds, both contracts must comply with the stipulations of the Directive and may not be awarded by way of a single procedure. In other words, since the marché d'exécution has its own subject-matter and award criteria it should be subjected to competition and not simply reserved for the holders of the initial marchés de définition.

25. The Court held in Commission v France ('Le Mans') (15) that 'the French Government submits … that the option, set out in the notice …, of awarding the contract relating to the second phase to the successful candidate in the design contest releases the contracting authority from the obligation to publish another notice prior to the award of that contract'. The Court then stated that 'that argument cannot be accepted. The principle of equal treatment of service providers … and the principle of transparency which flows from it ... require the subject-matter of each contract and the criteria governing its award to be clearly defined'. (16)

26. In the same judgment, the Court continued: 'that obligation exists where the subject-matter of a contract and the criteria selected for its award must be regarded as decisive for the purposes of determining which of the procedures provided for in the Directive is to be implemented and assessing whether the requirements related to that procedure have been observed.' Thus the Court concluded that 'in the present case the mere option of awarding the contract relating to the second phase according to criteria laid down in respect of a different contract, that is the one related to the first phase, does not amount to awarding the contract in accordance with one of the procedures laid down in the Directive.'

27. In the case which concerns us here, in its defence before the Court, the French Government has recognised itself that in the above judgment 'the Court gave a negative verdict on a procedure which is analogous [to the marchés de définition]'. In my view, it is clear that the marchés de définition do not, as a general rule, allow the second contract's (i.e. marché d'exécution) subject-matter, criteria for the selection and award to be initially established with sufficient precision in order to meet the requirements specified in the above judgment. The reason for that is the fact that the aim of the initial marchés de définition is in fact precisely to define the subject-matter and the tender conditions of the ulterior marché d'exécution.

28. Therefore, the procedure for the award of marchés de définition, pursuant to the contested provisions, runs counter to the principle of transparency laid down in Article 2 of the Directive. This procedure creates a situation of legal uncertainty both for contracting authorities and for economic operators, because of the risk of litigation which is inherent to it.

29. The French Government contests the argument in point 27 above and submits that the aim of the marchés de définition is to only define all the technical specifications of the ulterior contract and not its subject-matter. However, suffice it to state that the very wording of Article 73 of the CMP 2006 does not support that: its second paragraph provides that 'the purpose of such contracts is to explore the possibilities and conditions for establishing a contract subsequently, if necessary through production of a model or demonstrator'. Moreover, even though it may be the case in certain situations that the marchés de définition merely define the technical specifications, the procedure in question in fact certainly allows the tender conditions of the marché d'exécution to be completed or even drawn up in their entirety.

30. Furthermore, the French Government insists that it is possible for the subject-matter and criteria of the ulterior marché d'exécution to be established from the launch of the marchés de définition. The argument goes, there are many cases where the criteria for selection of candidatures for marché d'exécution are sufficiently independent from the marchés de définition in order for the former to be defined already at the stage of the marchés de définition. In its submissions to the Court, the French Government has furnished three examples of such cases.

31. In any event, it should be pointed out, first, that the French Government has accepted at the hearing that in fact problems do arise – clearly there are cases where the marchés de définition do not merely serve to define technical specifications but are instead used to complete or draw up the tender conditions of the marché d'exécution. Three examples of such cases were provided by the Commission before the Court. I consider that the French Government has failed to prove that the contested provisions allow in all cases and at all times transparency and sufficient clarity to be guaranteed to the effect that 'the subject-matter of [the marché d'exécution] and the criteria governing its award [are] clearly defined'. (17) In any event, a mere general definition such as 'urban development of city district X' – which it would appear is very often the only possible definition that may be given at the stage of invitations for tenders for the marchés de définition – most certainly does not meet the standard required by the Court in Commission v France ('Le Mans'). (18)

32. Last but not least, I consider it important to point out that the procedure for the award of marchés de définition is based on a bias. While the whole tenor of the Directive is that the promotion of competition between economic operators should be protected, the marchés de définition address only a certain type of economic operators – those and only those that have both design and construction capabilities. By its nature, the procedure for the award of marchés de définition makes such a pre-selection among all the potential economic operators. I consider that to be contrary to the spirit of Community public procurement rules. It is clear that regardless of how the marchés de définition develop in a particular case, the solution provided by the procedure will always result in a tender that is limited in nature.

33. It follows from the above considerations that the contested provisions permit the award of contracts with limited competition in situations not provided for by the Directive and they cannot be justified by any of the exceptions laid down by the Directive.

IV – Costs

34. Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure provides that the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Since the Commission has applied for costs and the French Republic has been unsuccessful, the latter must be ordered to pay the costs.

V – Conclusion

35. In the light of the foregoing considerations, I propose that the Court:

(1) declare that, by adopting and keeping in force Articles 73 and 74-IV of the Code des marchés publics (Public Procurement Code) adopted by Decree No 2006-975 of 1 August 2006, inasmuch as those provisions lay down a procedure for the award of marchés de définition (public contracts for designing the parameters, including the purpose, of a public works, supply or service contract) under which it is possible for the contracting authority to award a public works, supply or service contract to one of the holders of the initial marchés de définition by opening it to competition limited to those holders, the French Republic has failed to fulfil its obligations under Articles 2, 28 and 31 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts;

(2) order the French Republic to pay the costs.

3 – These are public contracts for designing the parameters, including the purpose, of a public works, supply or service contract, and are also referred to as 'design solutions tenders' or 'project definition contracts'. I note that only a procedure with several marchés de définition is at issue here – applicable where the conditions in Article 73(3) of the CMP 2006 are met – and not one where a single marché de définition is awarded.

8 – CEI and Others, cited in footnote 6, paragraph 15. See also Case 31/87 Beentjes [1988] ECR 4635, paragraph 20. The French Government submits that that case-law may be transposed to Directive 2004/18 notably because the second recital in the preamble to Directive 71/305 has become the third recital in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 and Article 2 of Directive 71/305 has become Article 28 of Directive 2004/18.

10 – That reading is confirmed by the travaux préparatoires for the Directive. The proposal for the Directive explained, to justify the wording of Article 28 of the Directive, that 'a new paragraph 2 has been added, which explicitly states the principle that the open procedure and the restricted procedure are the standard procedures. A new paragraph 3 [which was eventually merged with paragraph 2] describes the exception, which is that contracting authorities may only use the negotiated procedure in the specific cases and under the specific conditions listed in Articles 29, 30 and 31'.

11 – See Article 73 of the CMP 2006.

12 – The proposal for the Directive, page 6, stated that 'in the case of particularly complex contracts … purchasers are well aware of their needs but do not know in advance what … the best technical solution for satisfying those needs [is]. Discussion of the contract and dialogue between purchasers and suppliers is therefore necessary in such cases. But the standard procedures laid down by the public sector Directives … leave very little scope for discussion during the award of contracts and are therefore regarded as lacking in flexibility in situations of this type.'

---

13 – One of the reasons for that could be that the inclusion of marchés de définition was considered as not necessary since that procedure is similar in nature to the new competitive dialogue procedure – transposed into French law in Article 67 of the CMP 2006 as a completely autonomous procedure – which appears to address the same concerns.

---

14 – My position would appear to be supported by the French legal doctrine. See, most recently, for instance, Monjal, P.-Y., 'Le droit communautaire applicable aux marchés publics locaux français: quelques interrogations en forme d'inquiétude', Revue du Droit de l'Union européenne, No 4, 2008, pp. 729-738. However, the transparency principle may imply such a requirement. For example, it is probably not acceptable simply to state a requirement for tenders for "a school" without giving a clear indication of, for example, the number of pupils and the main type of facilities required. Reasonable precision needs to be established at the latest at the time of invitation to tenders'.

ARRÊT DE LA COUR (quatrième chambre)

Arrêt

1 Par sa requête, la Commission des Communautés européennes demande à la Cour de constater que, la Datenzentrale Baden-Württemberg (ci-après la «DZBW») ayant attribué un marché de fourniture d'un logiciel pour la gestion de l'immatriculation de véhicules automobiles par une procédure négociée sans publication d'un avis de marché, la République fédérale d'Allemagne a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu de la directive 93/36/CEE du Conseil, du 14 juin 1993, portant coordination des procédures de passation des marchés publics de fournitures (JO L 199, p. 1).

La directive 89/665

2 Il ressort des deuxième et troisième considérants de la directive 89/665/CEE du Conseil, du 21 décembre 1989, portant coordination des dispositions législatives, réglementaires et administratives relatives à l'application des procédures de recours en matière de passation des marchés publics de fournitures et de travaux (JO L 395, p. 33), que la finalité de cette directive est d'assurer l'application des règles communautaires en matière de marchés publics par des moyens de recours efficaces et rapides, en particulier à un stade où les violations peuvent encore être corrigées.

3 À cette fin, l'article 1er, paragraphe 1, de la directive 89/665 dispose:

4 Aux termes de l'article 2 de la directive 89/665:

a) de prendre, dans les délais les plus brefs et par voie de référé, des mesures provisoires ayant pour but de corriger la violation alléguée ou d'empêcher d'autres dommages d'être causés aux intérêts concernés […]

6. Les effets de l'exercice des pouvoirs visés au paragraphe 1 sur le contrat qui suit l'attribution d'un marché sont déterminés par le droit national.

En outre, sauf si une décision doit être annulée préalablement à l'octroi de dommages-intérêts, un État membre peut prévoir que, après la conclusion du contrat qui suit l'attribution d'un marché, les pouvoirs de l'instance responsable des procédures de recours se limitent à l'octroi des dommages-intérêts à toute personne lésée par une violation.

7. Les États membres veillent à ce que les décisions prises par les instances responsables des procédures de recours puissent être exécutées de manière efficace.»

5 La directive 93/36 prévoit à son article 6, paragraphes 2 à 4:

«2. Les pouvoirs adjudicateurs peuvent passer leurs marchés de fournitures en recourant à la procédure négociée en cas de dépôt de soumissions irrégulières en réponse à une procédure ouverte ou restreinte ou en cas de dépôt de soumissions inacceptables en vertu des dispositions nationales conformes au titre IV, pour autant que les conditions initiales du marché ne soient pas substantiellement modifiées. Les pouvoirs adjudicateurs publient dans ces cas un avis d'adjudication, à moins qu'ils n'incluent dans ces procédures négociées toutes les entreprises qui satisfont aux critères visés aux articles 20 à 24 et qui, lors de la procédure ouverte ou restreinte antérieure, ont soumis des offres conformes aux exigences formelles de la procédure d'adjudication.

3. Les pouvoirs adjudicateurs peuvent passer leurs marchés de fournitures en recourant à la procédure négociée sans publication préalable d'un avis d'adjudication dans les cas suivants:

c) lorsque, en raison de leur spécificité technique, artistique ou pour des raisons tenant à la protection des droits d'exclusivité, la fabrication ou la livraison des produits ne peut être confiée qu'à un fournisseur déterminé;

d) dans la mesure strictement nécessaire, lorsque l'urgence impérieuse, résultant d'événements imprévisibles pour les pouvoirs adjudicateurs en question n'est pas compatible avec les délais exigés par les procédures ouvertes, restreintes ou négociées visées au paragraphe 2. Les circonstances invoquées pour justifier l'urgence impérieuse ne doivent en aucun cas être imputables aux pouvoirs adjudicateurs;

6 Aux termes de l'article 9 de la directive 93/36:

«1. Les pouvoirs adjudicateurs font connaître, le plus rapidement possible après le début de leur exercice budgétaire, au moyen d'un avis indicatif, l'ensemble des marchés par groupes de produits qu'ils envisagent de passer au cours des douze mois suivants, lorsque le montant total estimé […] est égal ou supérieur à 750 000 écus.

2. Les pouvoirs adjudicateurs désireux de passer un marché public de fournitures par procédure ouverte ou restreinte ou par procédure négociée dans les cas visés à l'article 6 paragraphe 2 font connaître leur intention au moyen d'un avis.

7 L'article 11, paragraphe 1, de la directive 93/36 dispose:

«1. Dans les procédures restreintes et les procédures négociées au sens de l'article 6 paragraphe 2, le délai de réception des demandes de participation, fixé par les pouvoirs adjudicateurs, ne peut être inférieur à trente-sept jours à compter de la date d'envoi de l'avis.»

8 Aux termes de l'article 12, paragraphe 1, de ladite directive:

«1. Dans le cas où l'urgence rend impraticables les délais prévus à l'article 11, les pouvoirs adjudicateurs peuvent fixer les délais suivants:

a) un délai de réception des demandes de participation qui ne peut être inférieur à quinze jours à compter de la date d'envoi de l'avis;

b) un délai de réception des offres qui ne peut être inférieur à dix jours à compter de la date de l'invitation.»

Les faits et la procédure précontentieuse

10 Il ressort des pièces du dossier que cette décision était motivée par l'apparition de problèmes techniques au début de l'année 2005, des pannes totales étant survenues au mois de mai de la même année.

11 La DZBW a, au cours dudit mois, engagé des négociations avec l'Anstalt für Kommunale Datenverarbeitung in Bayern (ci-après l'«AKDB»), avec lequel un contrat de fourniture du logiciel en question a été conclu en décembre 2005, pour une durée de six ans.

12 À la suite d'une plainte, la Commission a, en application de l'article 226 CE, informé la République fédérale d'Allemagne, par une lettre de mise en demeure du 15 décembre 2006, que, à son avis, la conclusion de ce contrat entre la DZBW et l'AKDB, sans procédure de passation de marché public et sans appel d'offres au niveau européen, était contraire, notamment, à l'article 6 de la directive 93/36, lu en combinaison avec l'article 9 de celle-ci.

13 Par une communication du 5 mars 2007, la République fédérale d'Allemagne a indiqué à la Commission que la conclusion du contrat en cause avait fait l'objet, au niveau national, d'une procédure de recours, au sens de la directive 89/665, et que cette procédure avait été close de manière définitive par une décision de l'Oberlandesgericht Karlsruhe du 6 février 2007, de sorte qu'il n'y avait plus lieu, pour la Commission, de poursuivre la procédure en manquement, à défaut d'intérêt à agir.

14 Par une lettre du 29 juin 2007, la Commission a émis un avis motivé à l'encontre de la République fédérale d'Allemagne, dans lequel elle a indiqué que, dès lors que la procédure de recours, au sens de la directive 89/665, n'avait pas le même objet que la procédure en manquement engagée au titre de l'article 226 CE, ladite procédure de recours ne pouvait affecter la recevabilité d'un recours en manquement.

15 Par une lettre du 28 août 2007, la République fédérale d'Allemagne a maintenu la position exprimée dans sa communication du 5 mars 2007 en ce qui concerne la recevabilité du recours en manquement, et a ajouté, à titre subsidiaire, sur le fond, qu'il n'y avait pas lieu, en application de l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous c) et d), de la directive 93/36, de procéder à la publication d'un avis de marché.

16 N'étant pas satisfaite de cette réponse, la Commission a introduit le présent recours.

Sur le recours

Sur la recevabilité

Argumentation des parties

17 La République fédérale d'Allemagne invoque l'irrecevabilité du recours de la Commission, tirée de ce que la clôture définitive, devant les juridictions d'un État membre, d'une procédure de recours nationale, au sens de la directive 89/665, prive la Commission d'un intérêt à agir dans le cadre d'un recours en manquement dirigé contre cet État membre au titre de l'article 226 CE.

19 Cette possibilité serait toutefois limitée dans le temps, dans l'intérêt du pouvoir adjudicateur et du soumissionnaire retenu, conformément au principe de sécurité juridique.

20 Or, si la Commission pouvait, sans limitation dans le temps, remettre en cause, par un recours en manquement, une attribution de marché dont l'examen a été définitivement clos au terme d'une procédure de recours au sens de la directive 89/665, cette pondération des intérêts en jeu serait remise en cause, au détriment des principes de sécurité juridique et d'autonomie procédurale.

23 Cette analyse ne serait pas remise en cause par l'arrêt du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne (C-503/04, Rec. p. I-6153), dans lequel l'appréciation de la Cour aurait été limitée aux effets, sur le recours en manquement, de l'article 2, paragraphe 6, deuxième alinéa, de la directive 89/665. Cet arrêt ne concernerait donc pas la question de savoir si une procédure nationale de recours définitivement close fait obstacle à un recours en manquement, notamment en vertu du principe de l'autorité de la chose jugée.

24 La Commission considère que l'issue d'une procédure de recours au sens de la directive 89/665 en matière de passation de marchés publics, définitive au regard de la législation nationale, n'a aucune influence sur la recevabilité d'un recours en manquement exercé au titre de l'article 226 CE.

25 Elle soutient que la thèse de la République fédérale d'Allemagne méconnaît la portée essentielle de la procédure d'infraction prévue à l'article 226 CE, telle qu'elle ressort de la jurisprudence de la Cour, qui se distinguerait de la procédure de recours dans le cadre de la directive 89/665, notamment en termes de finalité et d'intérêts protégés (arrêt du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne, précité, points 33 à 35).

26 Il convient de rappeler que, selon une jurisprudence constante, dans le cadre de l'exercice des compétences qu'elle tient de l'article 226 CE, la Commission n'a pas à démontrer l'existence d'un intérêt spécifique à agir. Ladite disposition ne vise pas, en effet, à protéger les droits propres de la Commission. Celle-ci, dans l'intérêt général communautaire, a pour mission de veiller d'office à l'application, par les États membres, du traité CE et des dispositions prises par les institutions en vertu de celui-ci et de faire constater, en vue de leur cessation, l'existence de manquements éventuels aux obligations qui en dérivent (arrêts du 4 avril 1974, Commission/France, 167/73, Rec. p. 359, point 15; du 11 août 1995, Commission/Allemagne, C-431/92, Rec. p. I-2189, point 21; du 5 novembre 2002, Commission/Allemagne, C-476/98, Rec. p. I-9855, point 38, et du 10 avril 2003, Commission/Allemagne, C-20/01 et C-28/01, Rec. p. I-3609, point 29).

27 Eu égard à son rôle de gardienne du traité, la Commission est dès lors seule compétente pour décider s'il est opportun d'engager une procédure en constatation de manquement et en raison de quel agissement ou omission imputable à l'État membre concerné cette procédure doit être introduite. Elle peut donc demander à la Cour de constater un manquement qui consisterait à ne pas avoir atteint, dans un cas déterminé, le résultat visé par une directive (arrêts du 11 août 1995, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 22; du 5 novembre 2002, Commission/Belgique, C-471/98, Rec. p. I-9681, point 39, et du 10 avril 2003, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 30).

28 Ce principe vaut également en matière de marchés publics dans une situation dans laquelle les procédures de passation des marchés se sont entièrement déroulées avant la date d'expiration du délai fixé dans l'avis motivé, mais dans laquelle les contrats en cause n'ont pas été entièrement exécutés avant ladite date (voir, en ce sens, arrêt du 28 octobre 1999, Commission/Autriche, C-328/96, Rec. p. I-7479, points 43 à 45).

29 En l'espèce, il est constant que l'exécution du contrat en cause n'a pas encore cessé, puisque ce contrat a été conclu, en décembre 2005, pour une durée de six ans.

30 La République fédérale d'Allemagne soutient toutefois que la Commission ne saurait avoir d'intérêt à agir dans le cadre d'un recours en manquement exercé sur le fondement de l'article 226 CE, dès lors que l'attribution du marché en cause a fait l'objet d'une procédure de recours nationale, au sens de la directive 89/665, qui a été close par une décision juridictionnelle devenue définitive.

31 À cet égard, il convient de rappeler que la Cour a déjà précisé que l'article 2, paragraphe 6, de la directive 89/665, lequel autorise les États membres à maintenir les effets de contrats conclus en violation des directives en matière de passation des marchés publics et protège ainsi la confiance légitime des cocontractants, ne saurait, sans réduire la portée des dispositions du traité établissant le marché intérieur, avoir pour conséquence que le comportement du pouvoir adjudicateur à l'égard des tiers doive être considéré comme conforme au droit communautaire postérieurement à la conclusion de tels contrats (arrêts du 10 avril 2003, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 39, et du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 33).

32 La Cour a ainsi jugé que l'article 2, paragraphe 6, de la directive 89/665 ne saurait avoir d'incidence sur un recours exercé au titre de l'article 226 CE ou de l'article 228 CE (voir arrêt du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 34).

33 Quand bien même cette appréciation de la Cour a été limitée à l'article 2, paragraphe 6, de la directive 89/665, ainsi que l'a relevé à juste titre la République fédérale d'Allemagne, il n'en demeure pas moins qu'une telle conclusion vaut également pour la directive 89/665 envisagée dans son ensemble.

34 Ainsi qu'il ressort de ses deuxième et troisième considérants, cette directive a en effet pour objet de garantir l'existence, dans tous les États membres, de moyens de recours efficaces en cas de violation du droit communautaire en matière de marchés publics ou des règles nationales transposant ce droit, afin de garantir l'application effective des directives portant coordination des procédures de passation des marchés publics (arrêts du 12 décembre 2002, Universale-Bau e.a., C-470/99, Rec. p. I-11617, point 71, et du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 35).

35 Eu égard à son économie, ladite directive ne saurait être considérée comme réglant également la relation entre un État membre et la Communauté européenne, relation dont il s'agit dans le contexte de l'article 226 CE.

37 Ainsi, tout en obligeant, à son article 1er, paragraphe 1, les États membres à prendre, en ce qui concerne les procédures de passation des marchés publics, les mesures nécessaires pour assurer que les décisions prises par les pouvoirs adjudicateurs puissent faire l'objet de recours efficaces, la directive 89/665 ne saurait, sans réduire la portée des dispositions du traité, affecter l'application de l'article 226 CE.

38 Cette appréciation ne saurait être remise en cause par le risque éventuel que les soumissionnaires écartés contournent les délais prévus dans le cadre des procédures de recours nationales, au sens de la directive 89/665, en saisissant la Commission d'une plainte en vue d'un recours sur le fondement de l'article 226 CE, ainsi que l'avance la République fédérale d'Allemagne.

40 Cette appréciation ne saurait non plus être remise en cause par les arguments que la République fédérale d'Allemagne tire des principes de sécurité juridique, de confiance légitime et de l'autorité de la chose jugée.

41 En effet, à supposer même que les pouvoirs adjudicateurs puissent se voir opposer ces principes par le soumissionnaire retenu en cas de résiliation du contrat, un État membre ne saurait, en tout état de cause, s'en prévaloir pour justifier un manquement au titre de l'article 226 CE et, de ce fait, échapper à sa propre responsabilité en droit communautaire (voir, par analogie, arrêts du 17 avril 2007, AGM-COS.MET, C-470/03, Rec. p. I-2749, point 72, et du 18 juillet 2007, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 36).

42 Il résulte de l'ensemble des considérations qui précèdent que le recours est recevable.

Sur le fond

Argumentation des parties

43 Au soutien de son recours, la Commission fait valoir que le contrat en cause relève du champ d'application de la directive 93/36 et que la DZBW ne pouvait attribuer le marché par voie de procédure négociée sans invitation publique à participer, dès lors que n'étaient pas réunies, en l'espèce, les conditions auxquelles sont soumises les exceptions prévues à l'article 6, paragraphes 2 et 3, de ladite directive.

44 À cet égard, la Commission soutient que ces exceptions doivent faire l'objet d'une interprétation stricte et que c'est à l'État membre qui entend se prévaloir d'une dérogation qu'incombe la charge de la preuve que les circonstances exceptionnelles les justifiant existent effectivement. Or, la Commission considère que, en l'espèce, la République fédérale d'Allemagne n'a pas rapporté cette preuve, mais qu'elle s'est limitée à de simples allégations, sans fournir d'éléments concrets.

45 De surcroît, certaines allégations de la République fédérale d'Allemagne seraient contradictoires. Ainsi, la Commission constate que, dans sa réponse à l'avis motivé, cet État membre affirme, d'une part, que le logiciel retenu est le seul produit capable de traiter d'importantes quantités de données de la manière requise et, d'autre part, que le temps manquait pour recourir à des installations-tests. Or, une telle étape n'aurait logiquement été possible que s'il existait des produits de remplacement, ce qui était le cas dans les circonstances de l'espèce.

46 Pour ce qui est de l'urgence, la Commission fait observer que le temps écoulé entre l'apparition des premiers problèmes techniques affectant le logiciel à remplacer ou les premières pannes totales et la conclusion du contrat, à savoir presque une année, permettait largement de mettre en œuvre la procédure d'urgence prévue à l'article 12, paragraphe 1, de la directive 93/36. Or, la République fédérale d'Allemagne n'aurait pas démontré qu'il n'était pas même possible de respecter les délais très brefs, à savoir moins d'un mois, prévus par cette procédure.

48 Cet État membre fait valoir à cet égard que la charge de la preuve que les spécifications techniques sont remplies incombe au soumissionnaire et non au pouvoir adjudicateur, lequel n'est tenu qu'à une obligation de contrôle avec une attention et une précision adaptées aux circonstances.

49 Il était donc, selon ledit État membre, dénué de pertinence de savoir si un producteur concurrent aurait pu, dans le cadre d'une installation-test, apporter la preuve que son procédé répondait aux spécifications techniques en cause. Au contraire, le fait qu'une installation-test était inappropriée eu égard à l'urgence qu'il y avait de remplacer le logiciel en question aurait été décisif. Une installation-test aurait en effet conduit à un retard important, alors que la compatibilité avec les spécifications techniques du produit sélectionné avait été établie.

50 La République fédérale d'Allemagne rejette l'argument de la Commission tiré d'une contradiction sur l'existence d'éventuels produits de remplacement, de même qu'elle écarte celui tiré de la durée écoulée entre la décision de procéder au remplacement du logiciel et la conclusion du contrat en cause. En effet, le fait que sept mois s'écouleraient jusqu'à ce que l'installation du nouveau logiciel puisse débuter n'était pas prévisible lorsqu'il a été décidé de procéder au remplacement du logiciel utilisé.

51 Cet État membre conteste également la possibilité de respecter les délais d'urgence prévus à l'article 12, paragraphe 1, de la directive 93/36, en ce sens que c'est la perte de temps qui aurait résulté de l'établissement du cahier des charges et, en particulier, des installations-tests, et non les délais de publication, qui aurait posé un problème. En effet, la fiabilité d'autres produits dans les centres de calcul n'aurait pu être établie qu'après recours à une installation-test coûteuse pendant environ six mois.

52 À titre liminaire, il y a lieu de constater que la République fédérale d'Allemagne ne conteste pas que le marché en cause relève du champ d'application de la directive 93/36, de sorte que la conclusion de celui-ci était en principe soumise à une procédure de passation de marché public conforme à ladite directive, notamment à l'article 6, paragraphe 2, de cette dernière.

53 Cet État membre soutient toutefois qu'il était possible d'appliquer la procédure négociée et qu'il n'y avait pas lieu, en application de l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous c) et d), de la directive 93/36, de procéder à la publication d'un avis de marché.

54 D'emblée, il convient de rappeler que la procédure négociée revêt un caractère exceptionnel, l'article 6, paragraphes 2 et 3, de la directive 93/36 énumérant limitativement et expressément les seules exceptions pour lesquelles le recours à la procédure négociée est permis (arrêt du 8 avril 2008, Commission/Italie, C-337/05, Rec. p. I-2173, point 56 et jurisprudence citée).

55 Il convient également de rappeler qu'il est de jurisprudence constante que ces dispositions, en tant que dérogations aux règles visant à garantir l'effectivité des droits reconnus par le droit communautaire dans le secteur des marchés publics, doivent faire l'objet d'une interprétation stricte (voir, en ce sens, arrêts du 17 novembre 1993, Commission/Espagne, C-71/92, Rec. p. I-5923, point 36; du 18 mai 1995, Commission/Italie, C-57/94, Rec. p. I-1249, point 23; du 10 avril 2003, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 58; du 14 septembre 2004, Commission/Italie, C-385/02, Rec. p. I-8121, point 19, et du 2 octobre 2008, Commission/Italie, C-157/06, non encore publié au Recueil, point 23).

56 Il faut souligner, en outre, que c'est à celui qui entend se prévaloir desdites dérogations qu'incombe la charge de la preuve que les circonstances exceptionnelles les justifiant existent effectivement (voir, en ce sens, arrêts du 3 mai 1994, Commission/Espagne, C-328/92, Rec. p. I-1569, points 15 et 16; du 18 mai 1995, Commission/Italie, précité, point 23; du 10 avril 2003, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 58; du 14 septembre 2004, Commission/Italie, précité, point 19, et du 2 octobre 2008, Commission/Italie, précité, point 23).

57 Il importe donc, en l'espèce, de vérifier si la République fédérale d'Allemagne a rapporté la preuve que le marché en cause pouvait, en application de l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous c) ou d), de la directive 93/36, faire l'objet d'une procédure négociée sans publication préalable d'un avis de marché.

58 À cet égard, il convient, en premier lieu, de rappeler que, en vertu de l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous c), de la directive 93/36, les pouvoirs adjudicateurs peuvent passer leurs marchés de fournitures en recourant à la procédure négociée, sans publication préalable d'un avis de marché, lorsque, en raison de leur spécificité technique, la fabrication ou la livraison des produits ne peut être confiée qu'à un fournisseur déterminé.

59 Selon la République fédérale d'Allemagne, en raison de la spécificité technique de l'objet du marché de fourniture en cause, à savoir un logiciel pour la gestion centralisée de l'immatriculation de véhicules automobiles, ce marché ne pouvait être confié qu'à un fournisseur déterminé.

60 Cette argumentation ne saurait prospérer.

61 En effet, il importe de relever que, loin de faire état de recherches sérieuses que la DZBW aurait menées au niveau européen, après avoir décidé de remplacer le logiciel en question, pour identifier des entreprises à même de fournir un logiciel adapté, la République fédérale d'Allemagne s'est bornée à rejeter la fonctionnalité du produit d'une entreprise concurrente de l'AKDB au niveau national.

62 Or, le simple fait d'affirmer que la fourniture en cause ne pouvait être confiée qu'à un fournisseur déterminé puisque le concurrent présent sur le marché national n'offrait pas un produit satisfaisant aux exigences techniques requises ne saurait suffire à établir que les circonstances exceptionnelles justifiant les dérogations prévues à l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous c), de la directive 93/36 existaient effectivement.

63 Il ne saurait, en effet, être exclu que, si des recherches sérieuses avaient été menées au niveau européen, des entreprises à même de fournir un logiciel adapté auraient pu être identifiées.

64 Par conséquent, l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous c), de la directive 93/36 ne peut être utilement invoqué par la République fédérale d'Allemagne pour justifier, en ce qui concerne le marché en cause, le recours à la procédure négociée sans publication préalable d'un avis de marché.

65 En second lieu, il convient de rappeler que, en vertu de l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous d), de la directive 93/36, les pouvoirs adjudicateurs peuvent passer leurs marchés de fournitures en recourant à la procédure négociée sans publication préalable d'un avis de marché, dans la mesure strictement nécessaire, lorsque l'urgence impérieuse, résultant d'événements imprévisibles pour les pouvoirs adjudicateurs en question, n'est pas compatible avec les délais exigés par les procédures ouvertes, restreintes ou négociées visées à cet article 6, paragraphe 2, les circonstances invoquées pour justifier l'urgence impérieuse ne devant en aucun cas être imputables aux pouvoirs adjudicateurs.

66 Selon la République fédérale d'Allemagne, les problèmes techniques affectant le logiciel alors utilisé ne pouvaient être éliminés rapidement, ce qui rendait inévitable une décision en vue de l'introduction d'un produit de remplacement immédiatement disponible sur le marché et conforme aux exigences techniques applicables. Il s'agirait là d'une urgence impérieuse justifiant que les pouvoirs adjudicateurs procèdent à l'attribution du marché en cause sans publication préalable d'un avis.

67 Cette argumentation ne saurait non plus prospérer.

68 D'emblée, il importe en effet de rappeler qu'il résulte de la jurisprudence de la Cour que la dérogation énoncée à l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous d), de la directive 93/36 est subordonnée à trois conditions cumulatives.

69 Elle suppose l'existence d'un événement imprévisible, d'une urgence impérieuse incompatible avec les délais exigés par d'autres procédures et d'un lien de causalité entre l'événement imprévisible et l'urgence impérieuse qui en résulte (voir, en ce sens, arrêts du 2 août 1993, Commission/Italie, C-107/92, Rec. p. I-4655, point 12; du 28 mars 1996, Commission/Allemagne, C-318/94, Rec. p. I-1949, point 14, et du 18 novembre 2004, Commission/Allemagne, C-126/03, Rec. p. I-11197, point 23).

70 Or, dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, il importe, tout d'abord, de relever que la République fédérale d'Allemagne ne conteste pas que plusieurs mois se sont écoulés entre la décision de procéder au remplacement du logiciel utilisé, l'ouverture de négociations et la conclusion du contrat en cause.

71 Dans de telles circonstances, il n'a pas été établi par cet État membre que le remplacement dudit logiciel relevait d'une situation d'urgence impérieuse justifiant le recours à une procédure négociée sans publication préalable d'avis de marché.

72 Il convient, ensuite, de considérer que, dès lors que des pannes étaient apparues dès le début de l'année 2005, le pouvoir adjudicateur aurait pu, dès cette période, lancer une procédure d'appel d'offres. Dans ces conditions, l'urgence éventuelle, à la supposer établie au cours du mois de mai 2005, lors des pannes générales et au début des négociations engagées avec l'AKDB, doit être considérée comme étant, au moins en partie, imputable au pouvoir adjudicateur.

74 Or, dans les circonstances de la présente affaire, force est de considérer que cette exigence n'a pas été respectée par le pouvoir adjudicateur.

75 En effet, dès lors que plusieurs mois se sont écoulés entre la décision de remplacer le logiciel et la conclusion du marché en cause, ainsi qu'il a été rappelé aux points 9 à 11 et 70 du présent arrêt, il est manifeste qu'il était possible, pour le moins, de conduire une procédure restreinte accélérée, en application de l'article 12, paragraphe 1, de la directive 93/36 (voir, en ce sens, arrêts du 18 mars 1992, Commission/Espagne, C-24/91, Rec. p. I-1989, point 14; du 2 août 1993, Commission/Italie, précité, point 13, et du 18 novembre 2004, Commission/Allemagne, précité, point 23).

76 Il s'ensuit que la République fédérale d'Allemagne n'a pas démontré qu'il existait, en l'espèce, une situation d'urgence impérieuse.

77 Par conséquent, l'article 6, paragraphe 3, sous d), de la directive 93/36 ne peut non plus être utilement invoqué par la République fédérale d'Allemagne pour justifier, en ce qui concerne le marché en cause, le recours à la procédure négociée sans publication préalable d'un avis de marché.

78 Eu égard à l'ensemble des considérations qui précèdent, il convient de constater que, la DZBW ayant attribué un marché de fourniture d'un logiciel pour la gestion de l'immatriculation de véhicules automobiles par une procédure négociée sans publication d'un avis de marché, la République fédérale d'Allemagne a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu de la directive 93/36.

Sur les dépens

79 Aux termes de l'article 69, paragraphe 2, du règlement de procédure, toute partie qui succombe est condamnée aux dépens, s'il est conclu en ce sens. La Commission ayant conclu à la condamnation de la République fédérale d'Allemagne et celle-ci ayant succombé en ses moyens, il y a lieu de la condamner aux dépens.

Par ces motifs, la Cour (quatrième chambre) déclare et arrête:

1) La Datenzentrale Baden-Württemberg ayant attribué un marché de fourniture d'un logiciel pour la gestion de l'immatriculation de véhicules automobiles par une procédure négociée sans publication d'un avis de marché, la République fédérale d'Allemagne a manqué aux obligations qui lui incombent en vertu de la directive 93/36/CEE du Conseil, du 14 juin 1993, portant coordination des procédures de passation des marchés publics de fournitures.

2) La République fédérale d'Allemagne est condamnée aux dépens.

having regard to the written procedure and further to the hearing on 12 January 2010, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 14 April 2010,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By its application, the Commission of the European Communities requests the Court to declare that, because local authorities and local authority undertakings having more than 1 218 employees have awarded service contracts in respect of occupational old-age pensions directly, without a call for tenders at European Union level, to bodies and undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the Collective agreement on the conversion, for local authority employees, of earnings into pension savings

2 In its reply, the Commission redefined the subject-matter of its action by requesting the Court to find a failure to fulfil those obligations because local authorities and local authority undertakings which had more than 2 044 employees, in 2004 and 2005, more than 1 827 employees, in 2006 and 2007, and more than 1 783 employees, in the period from 2008, awarded such contracts directly, without a call for tenders at European Union level, to bodies and undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA.

3 At the hearing, the Commission redefined the subject-matter of its action by requesting the Court to find the failure to fulfil its obligations because local authorities and local authority undertakings which had more than 2 697 employees, in 2004 and 2005, and more than 2 402 employees, in 2006 and 2007, had awarded such contracts.

European Union law

4 The eighth recital in the preamble to Directive 92/50 states that 'the provision of services is covered by this Directive only in so far as it is based on contracts; … the provision of services on other bases, such as law or regulations, or employment contracts, is not covered'.

5 Under Article 1(a)(viii) of Directive 92/50, 'public service contracts' is to mean, for the purposes of the directive, 'contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority', to the exclusion, inter alia, of 'employment contracts'.

6 Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 provides:

'contracting authorities shall mean the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law.

Body governed by public law means any body:

– established for the specific purpose of meeting needs in the general interest, not having an industrial or commercial character, and

– having legal personality and – financed, for the most part, by the State, or regional or local authorities, or other bodies governed by public law; or subject to management supervision by those bodies; or having an administrative, managerial or supervisory board, more than half of whose members are appointed by the State, regional or local authorities or by other bodies governed by public law.

7 Article 7(1), (4) and (5) of Directive 92/50 provides:

'1. (a) This Directive shall apply to:

– public service contracts concerning the services referred to in Annex I A …:

(ii) awarded by the contracting authorities listed in Article 1(b) other than those referred to in Annex I to [Council] Directive 93/36/EEC [of 14 June 1993 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 1)] and where the estimated value net of VAT is not less than the equivalent in ecus of 200 000 [special drawing rights (SDRs)].

4. For the purposes of calculating the estimated contract value for the following types of services, account shall be taken, where appropriate:

– as regards insurance services, of the premium payable,

5. In the case of contracts which do not specify a total price, the basis for calculating the estimated contract value shall be:

– in the case of fixed-term contracts, where their term is 48 months or less, the total contract value for its duration;

– in the case of contracts of indefinite duration or with a term of more than 48 months, the monthly instalment multiplied by 48.’

8 German local authorities and local authority undertakings are not referred to in Annex I to Directive 93/36.

9 Under Article 8 of Directive 92/50, ‘contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I A shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI’.

10 The titles referred to in Article 8 of Directive 92/50 concern the choice of award procedures and rules governing design contests (Title III), common rules in the technical field (Title IV), common advertising rules (Title V) and common rules on participation, criteria for qualitative selection and criteria for the award of contracts (Title VI).

11 The ‘services within the meaning of Article 8’ that are listed in Annex I A to Directive 92/50 include, in Category No 6, ‘financial services’, which comprise, in Category No 6(a), ‘insurance services’ and, in Category No 6(b), ‘banking and investment services’.

12 Recital 28 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18 states:

‘Employment and occupation are key elements in guaranteeing equal opportunities for all and contribute to integration in society. In this context, sheltered workshops and sheltered employment programmes contribute efficiently towards the integration or reintegration of people with disabilities in the labour market. However, such workshops might not be able to obtain contracts under normal conditions of competition. Consequently, it is appropriate to provide that Member States may reserve the right to participate in award procedures for public contracts to such workshops or reserve performance of contracts to the context of sheltered employment programmes.’

13 Article 1(2)(a) and (d) of Directive 2004/18 defines ‘public contracts’ as ‘contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive’, and ‘public service contracts’ as ‘public contracts other than public works or supply contracts having as their object the provision of services referred to in Annex II'.

14 Article 1(5) of Directive 2004/18 defines 'framework agreement' as 'an agreement between one or more contracting authorities and one or more economic operators, the purpose of which is to establish the terms governing contracts to be awarded during a given period, in particular with regard to price and, where appropriate, the quantity envisaged'.

15 Directive 2004/18 includes, in Article 1(9), a definition of 'contracting authorities' largely corresponding to the definition in Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50.

16 Article 7(b) of Directive 2004/18 states that the directive is to apply to public service contracts which have a value exclusive of value added tax ('VAT') estimated to be equal to or greater than EUR 249 000. This amount was successively reduced to EUR 236 000 by Commission Regulation (EC) No 1874/2004 of 28 October 2004 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts (OJ 2004 L 326, p. 17) and then to EUR 211 000 by Commission Regulation (EC) No 2083/2005 of 19 December 2005 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts (OJ 2005 L 333, p. 28).

17 Article 9(1), (8) and (9) of Directive 2004/18 provides:

'1. The calculation of the estimated value of a public contract shall be based on the total amount payable, net of VAT, as estimated by the contracting authority. This calculation shall take account of the estimated total amount, including any form of option and any renewals of the contract.

8. With regard to public service contracts, the value to be taken as a basis for calculating the estimated contract value shall, where appropriate, be the following:

(a) for the following types of services:

(i) insurance services: the premium payable and other forms of remuneration;

(b) for service contracts which do not indicate a total price:

(i) in the case of fixed-term contracts, if that term is less than or equal to 48 months: the total value for their full term;

(ii) in the case of contracts without a fixed term or with a term greater than 48 months: the monthly value multiplied by 48.

9. With regard to framework agreements …, the value to be taken into consideration shall be the maximum estimated value net of VAT of all the contracts envisaged for the total term of the framework agreement ...'

18 By virtue of Article 16(e), Directive 2004/18 is not to apply 'to public service contracts for … employment contracts'.

19 As provided in Article 20 of Directive 2004/18, 'contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex II A shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 23 to 55'.

20 Articles 23 to 55 of Directive 2004/18 set out, in turn, specific rules governing specifications and contract documents (Articles 23 to 27), rules relating to the procedures (Articles 28 to 34), rules on advertising and transparency (Articles 35 to 43) and rules relating to the conduct of the procedure (Articles 44 to 55).

21 The services listed in Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 include, in Category No 6, ‘financial services’, which comprise, in Category No 6(a), ‘insurance services’ and, in Category No 6(b), ‘banking and investment services’.

22 The list of bodies and categories of bodies governed by public law as referred to in the second subparagraph of Article 1(9) of Directive 2004/18, which is set out in Annex III to that directive, refers, in section III which is devoted to the Federal Republic of Germany, to ‘authorities, establishments and foundations governed by public law and created by Federal, State or local authorities’.

National law

23 The Law on the enhancement of occupational old-age pensions (Gesetz zur Verbesserung der betrieblichen Altersversorgung) of 19 December 1974 (BGBl. I, p. 3610), as amended by Article 5 of the Law of 21 December 2008 (BGBl. I, p. 2940) (‘the BetrAVG’), provides in Paragraph 1, headed ‘Employer’s guarantee concerning an occupational old-age pension’:

‘(1) If an employee is given by his employer a guarantee of old-age, invalidity or survivor’s pension benefits on grounds of his employment relationship (occupational old-age pension), the provisions of this Law shall apply. A scheme for occupational old-age pensions may be implemented directly by an employer or through the conduit of one of the pension providers mentioned in Paragraph 1b(2) to (4). An employer shall be responsible for ensuring the provision of the benefits he has guaranteed even where he does not implement the scheme directly.

(2) Occupational old-age pension schemes shall also be deemed to exist where:

3. future entitlement to earnings is converted into an inchoate right, of equal value, to pension benefits (conversion of earnings), or

4. the employee pays contributions from his pay to a pension fund or into a life assurance policy in order to fund occupational old-age pension benefits and the employer’s guarantee also covers the benefits resulting from those contributions; the provisions relating to the conversion of earnings shall be applied in this regard mutatis mutandis, in so far as the guaranteed benefits resulting from those contributions are funded by capitalisation.

24 Paragraph 1a(1) of the BetrAVG, headed ‘Right to an occupational old-age pension funded through conversion of earnings’, provides:

‘An employee shall have the right to demand from his employer that the future earnings to which he is entitled, to a maximum of 4% of the relevant ceiling for the assessment of contributions to the statutory pension fund, are paid into an occupational old-age pension scheme on the basis of conversion of earnings. The scheme for the implementation of an employee’s right shall be determined by agreement. If an employer is willing to allow for implementation through the conduit of a pension fund (Paragraph 1b(3)), the occupational old-age pension scheme shall be implemented by that body; otherwise an employee shall have the right to demand that his employer concludes a life assurance contract in his favour (Paragraph 1b(2)). In so far as this right is exercised, the employee shall apply annually an amount corresponding to at least a hundred and sixtieth of the basic amount under Paragraph 18(1) of the Fourth Book of the Code of Social Law to his occupational old-age pension. In so far as the employee applies part of his regular earnings to an occupational old-age pension, the employer can require that over a calendar year the monthly amount applied remains the same.’

25 Paragraph 17 of the BetrAVG, headed ‘Personal scope and derogation by way of collective agreement’, provides:

(3) Derogations from the provisions of Paragraphs 1a … may be effected by collective agreement. The derogating provisions shall apply between employers and employees not bound by a collective agreement if they agree that the relevant provisions of the collective agreement are to apply between them. As to the remainder, the provisions of this Law cannot be derogated from to the employee's disadvantage.

(5) To the extent that entitlement to earnings is based on a collective agreement, conversion of earnings may be effected in respect of that entitlement only to the extent that a collective agreement provides for or permits such conversion.'

26 On 18 February 2003, the TV-EUmw/VKA was concluded between the Vereinigung der kommunalen Arbeitgeberverbände (Federation of Local Authority Employer Associations; 'the VKA') and the Vereinte Dienstleistungsgewerkschaft eV (ver.di) (United Service Sector Union). The VKA concluded a similar collective agreement with another union, namely dbb tarifunion.

27 Paragraphs 2 and 3 of the TV-EUmw/VKA grant employees covered by one of the collective agreements referred to in Paragraph 1 thereof the right to demand from their employer the partial conversion, within the limits laid down by the BetrAVG, of their future entitlement to earnings into pension savings. Under Paragraph 5 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, such a request must be made to the employer in writing. Paragraph 5 also provides that the employee is to be bound for a period of at least a year by his agreement with his employer concerning the partial conversion of his future earnings.

28 Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, headed 'Implementation methods', provides:

'Subject to the second and third sentences of this paragraph, conversion of earnings within the framework of the implementation methods provided for by the [BetrAVG] shall be implemented with public bodies offering supplementary pension schemes.

In the case of occupational old-age pension provision referred to in the first sentence, an employer may also adopt implementation methods offered by the Sparkassen finance group or local authority insurance companies.

Should the need arise, a collective agreement at district level may provide for derogations from the first and second sentence of this paragraph.'

29 Under Paragraph 7(1), the TV-EUmw/VKA entered into force on 1 January 2003. Paragraph 7(2) provides that the TV-EUmw/VKA may be terminated, on giving three months' notice, at the end of a calendar year, on 31 December 2008 at the earliest.

Pre-litigation procedure

30 Following receipt of a complaint, the Commission informed the Federal Republic of Germany by letter of formal notice dated 18 October 2005 that, on account of the award, by a number of local authorities and local authority undertakings, of contracts in respect of occupational old-age pensions (pension insurance contracts) to bodies and undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA without a call for tenders at European Union level, it could have infringed Article 8, in conjunction with Titles III to VI, of Directive 92/50 and, in any event, the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

31 By letter of 29 March 2006, the Federal Republic of Germany disputed the fact that local authorities and local authority undertakings act as 'contracting authorities' within the meaning of Directive 92/50 when they perform their function of employer in the field of occupational old-age pensions. It also submitted that the pension insurance contracts at issue fall within the employment relationships and do not therefore constitute public contracts, as the local authority employers merely assume the function of a payments office for the purposes of an exchange of consideration between the employees who have opted for partial conversion of their earnings into pension savings and the pension providers. It asserted too that application of public procurement law to the award of the contracts at issue would be contrary to the autonomy of management and labour protected in Article 9(3) of the German Basic Law (Grundgesetz).

32 Since the Commission was not satisfied by this response, it sent the Federal Republic of Germany a reasoned opinion dated 4 July 2006, in which it explained that its complaints had to be understood as concerning also, from 1 February 2006, breach of Article 20, in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55, of Directive 2004/18, which essentially reproduced the provisions of Directive 92/50 relied upon in the letter of formal notice.

33 In its response of 15 November 2006 to the reasoned opinion, the Federal Republic of Germany adhered to its position, while annexing to the response an expert's report designed to show that the salary conversion measure at issue falls within the concept of earnings. It also maintained that the thresholds for application of European Union public procurement legislation are not reached in the present case, given the need to have regard to each separate contract in itself. Finally, it stated that it would not in any event be able to remedy any breach of European Union law given that it does not have the power to issue instructions to management and labour.

34 By letter of 30 January 2007, the Commission sent the Federal Republic of Germany a request for information for the purpose of determining, in particular, whether grounds of social policy could justify in this instance an exception to European Union public procurement law.

35 Since the Commission took the view that the Federal Republic of Germany did not provide any appropriate justification in its response of 1 March 2007 to that request, it decided to bring the present action.

Applicability of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 to the awarding of contracts to bodies or undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA

36 It is appropriate to examine at the outset whether, as is asserted by the Federal Republic of Germany as well as the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden, the awards of contracts to bodies or undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA ('the contract awards at issue') fall, because of their nature and subject-matter, outside the field of application of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. Advocating that the Court's reasoning in Case C-67/96 Albany [1999] ECR I-5751 and Case C-222/98 van der Woude [2000] ECR I-7111 should be applied to the present context, these Member States base their arguments on the fact that those awards implemented a collective agreement negotiated between management and labour, more specifically Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA.

37 In that regard, it should be noted, first, that the right to bargain collectively, which the signatories of the TV-EUmw/VKA have exercised in the present case, is recognised both by the provisions of various international instruments which the Member States have cooperated in or signed, such as Article 6 of the European Social Charter, signed at Turin on 18 October 1961 and revised at Strasbourg on 3 May 1996, and by the provisions of instruments drawn up by the Member States at Community level or in the context of the European Union, such as Article 12 of the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers adopted at the meeting of the European Council held in Strasbourg on 9 December 1989, and Article 28 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union ('the Charter'), an instrument to which Article 6 TEU accords the same legal value as the Treaties.

38 It is apparent from Article 28 of the Charter, read in conjunction with Article 52(6) thereof, that protection of the fundamental right to bargain collectively must take full account, in particular, of national laws and practices.

39 Furthermore, by virtue of Article 152 TFEU the European Union recognises and promotes the role of the social partners at its level, taking into account the diversity of national systems.

40 It is to be noted, second, that, as is common ground between the parties to the dispute, the TV-EUmw/VKA meets, in a general way, a social objective. It is intended to enhance the level of the retirement pensions of the workers concerned, by promoting, in accordance with the BetrAVG, the development of pension saving by means of partial conversion of employees' earnings.

41 However, the fact that the right to bargain collectively is a fundamental right, and the TV-EUmw/VKA's social objective perceived as a whole, cannot, in themselves, mean that local authority employers are automatically excluded from the obligation to comply with the requirements stemming from Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, which implement freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services in the field of public procurement.

42 The Court has already held that the terms of collective agreements are not excluded from the scope of the provisions on freedom of movement for persons (see Case C-438/05 International Transport Workers' Federation and Finnish Seamen's Union, 'Viking Line', [2007] ECR I-10779, paragraph 54 and the case-law cited).

43 Furthermore, exercise of a fundamental right such as the right to bargain collectively may be subject to certain restrictions (see, to this effect, Viking Line, paragraph 44, and Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767, paragraph 91). In particular, while it is true that the right to bargain collectively enjoys in Germany the constitutional protection conferred, generally, by Article 9(3) of the German Basic Law upon the right to form associations to safeguard and promote working and economic conditions, the fact remains that, as provided in Article 28 of the Charter, that right must be exercised in accordance with European Union law.

44 Exercise of the fundamental right to bargain collectively must therefore be reconciled with the requirements stemming from the freedoms protected by the FEU Treaty, which in the present instance Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 are intended to implement, and be in accordance with the principle of proportionality (see, to this effect, Viking Line, paragraph 46, and Laval un Partneri, paragraph 94).

45 It is admittedly true that, in particular in Albany and van der Woude, the Court has held that, despite the restrictions of competition inherent in it, a collective agreement between the organisations representing employers and workers which sets up in a particular sector a supplementary pension scheme managed by a pension fund to which affiliation is compulsory does not fall within Article 101(1) TFEU.

46 However, such reasoning does not in any way prejudge the separate question, specific to the present case, of compliance, when designating the pension providers entrusted with implementing the salary conversion measure at issue, with the European Union rules relating to application of freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services in the field of public procurement, in the context of a collective employment agreement concerning public-sector employers.

47 In that regard, it cannot be considered that it is inherent in the very exercise of the freedom of management and labour and of the right to bargain collectively that the directives which implement freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services in the field of public procurement will be prejudiced (see, to this effect, Viking Line, paragraph 52).

48 Furthermore, the fact that an agreement or an activity is excluded from the scope of the provisions of the Treaty on competition does not automatically mean that that agreement or activity is also excluded from the obligation to comply with the requirements stemming from the provisions of those directives since those two sets of provisions are to be applied in different circumstances (see, to this effect, Viking Line, paragraph 53 and the case-law cited).

49 Finally, unlike the objective, agreed between management and labour, of enhancing the level of the pensions of local authority employees, the designation of bodies and undertakings in a collective agreement such as that at issue here does not affect the essence of the right to bargain collectively.

50 In light of the foregoing, the fact that the contract awards at issue follow from the application of a collective agreement does not, in itself, result in the present instance being excluded from the scope of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

51 The question therefore arises of reconciliation of the requirements related to attainment of the social objective pursued here by the parties to the collective bargaining with the requirements stemming from Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

52 Answering this question entails verification, in the light of the material in the file, as to whether, when establishing the content of Paragraph 6 of TV-EUmw/VKA, which is referred to by the Commission in its action inasmuch as that paragraph served as the basis for the contract awards at issue, a fair balance was struck in the account taken of the respective interests involved, namely enhancement of the level of the retirement pensions of the workers concerned, on the one hand, and attainment of freedom of establishment and of the freedom to provide services, and opening-up to competition at European Union level, on the other (see, by analogy, Case C-112/00 Schmidberger [2003] ECR I-5659, paragraphs 81 and 82).

53 While it is true that Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA forms part of a collective agreement which, as noted in paragraph 40 of the present judgment, pursues, in a general way, a social objective, it must however be stated, as the Advocate General has found in point 176 of her Opinion, that that paragraph effectively disapplies the rules stemming from Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 completely, and for an indefinite period, in the field of local authority employees' pension saving, a fact which the Federal Republic of Germany has not denied.

54 The Federal Republic of Germany submits however, first, that Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA reflects a joint solution that takes account of the respective interests of the signatories of that collective agreement. It states that the designation, in the agreement, of the only bodies and undertakings which provide pensions that can be entrusted with implementation of the salary conversion measure introduced in local authorities enables workers to be involved, and their interests to be taken into account, in a better manner than if the pension provider, or providers, were selected by each local authority employer in a procurement procedure.

55 It must nevertheless be stated that it is possible to reconcile application of the procurement procedures with the application of mechanisms, stemming, in particular, from German social law, which ensure that workers or their representatives participate, in the local authority or the local authority undertaking concerned, in the taking of the decision concerning selection of the body or bodies to which implementation of the salary conversion measure will be entrusted, a fact which the Federal Republic of Germany did not contest at the hearing.

56 Nor can application of the procurement procedures preclude the call for tenders from imposing upon interested tenderers conditions reflecting the interests of the workers concerned.

57 Second, the Federal Republic of Germany, supported on this point by the Kingdom of Denmark, submits that the tenders of the bodies and undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA are based on the principle of solidarity. At the hearing, emphasis was placed on the fact that, because of the pooling of risks, an insurance contract enables the 'good' and the 'bad' risks to be offset, in particular where occupational old-age pension benefits are in the form of an annuity paid until the recipient's death. It was also stressed that those bodies and undertakings do not engage in any form of selection of interested applicants based on medical criteria.

58 However, preservation of those elements of solidarity is not inherently irreconcilable with the application of a procurement procedure. The pooling of risks, upon which any insurance activity is based, can be ensured by a body or undertaking that provides pensions which is selected following a call for tenders at European Union level. Nor is there anything in the public procurement directives to preclude a local authority employer from specifying, in the terms of the call for tenders, the conditions to be complied with by tenderers in order to prevent, or place limits on, workers interested in salary conversion being selected on the basis of medical grounds.

59 Third, the Federal Republic of Germany stresses the experience and the financial soundness of the bodies and undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA. It adds that the choice made of those bodies and undertakings is such as to ensure that the salary conversion measure is attractive to local authority employees.

60 However, apart from the fact that the European Union public procurement directives contain rules enabling contracting authorities to satisfy themselves as to the professional ability and financial standing of tenderers, it cannot be presumed that these factors of experience and financial soundness are generally lacking in the case of bodies and undertakings providing pensions other than those referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA.

61 In particular, under Directive 2002/83/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 5 November 2002 concerning life assurance (OJ 2002 L 345, p. 1), private undertakings engaging in group insurance are subject to prudential supervision rules coordinated at European Union level, which are intended, in particular, to guarantee their financial soundness.

62 Institutions for occupational retirement provision are subject to rules of the same kind by virtue of Directive 2003/41/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 3 June 2003 on the activities and supervision of institutions for occupational retirement provision (OJ 2003 L 235, p. 10). These rules, coordinated at European Union level, are designed to ensure a high degree of security for future pensioners who are to enjoy the benefits of those institutions (see, to this effect, Case C-343/08 Commission v Czech Republic [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraph 45).

63 Also, according to the particulars provided by the Federal Republic of Germany, pension insurance contracts have, on the basis of the third sentence of Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, been awarded directly by local authority employers to bodies other than those referred to in the first and second sentences of that paragraph. It has not in any way been established, or even asserted, in the course of the present proceedings that that solution reduced the interest of the workers concerned in the salary conversion measure.

64 Fourth, the Federal Republic of Germany states that Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA enables local authority employers to do without an individual procedure for selecting the body or bodies to be entrusted with implementing the salary conversion measure at the level of their own authority or undertaking. Furthermore, the management costs charged by the bodies and undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 are low.

65 However, such considerations cannot justify not applying provisions and procedures that are supposed to guarantee, in the interest of local authority employers and their employees, access to a broadened offer of services at European Union level.

66 In light of the considerations set out in paragraphs 53 to 65 of the present judgment, it is to be concluded that compliance with the directives concerning public service contracts does not prove irreconcilable with attainment of the social objective pursued by the signatories of the TV-EUmw/VKA in the exercise of their right to bargain collectively.

67 It must therefore be examined whether the contract awards at issue fall within the conditions for application of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

Classification of the contracts at issue as public service contracts within the meaning of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18

68 It should be noted first of all that it is common ground between the parties to the present proceedings that the contracts at issue concern insurance services within the meaning of Category No 6(a) of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 or Annex II A to Directive 2004/18.

69 It is also common ground between those parties that the contracts were concluded in writing within the meaning of Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50 or Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18.

70 On the other hand, the Federal Republic of Germany, supported by the Kingdom of Sweden, contests, first, that the other conditions required by those provisions for classification as ‘public contracts’ within the meaning of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 are met in the present case.

71 The Federal Republic of Germany asserts that local authority employers do not act as contracting authorities when they merely implement, in the field of occupational old-age pensions, a choice predetermined by a collective agreement, without having any decision-making autonomy which may lead them to prefer, of their own accord, such or such a tenderer.

72 It further contends that the contracts at issue are not contracts for pecuniary interest. A relationship of economic exchange exists only between the pension provider and the worker who has opted for salary conversion. The employer merely forwards to the pension provider, on the worker's behalf, the premiums deducted for the purposes of conversion from his earnings. Those contracts concern implementation of a measure benefiting the employees and not the award of a contract to the benefit of the public authorities.

73 As to those submissions, first of all, neither Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 nor Article 1(9) of Directive 2004/18 makes a distinction between public contracts awarded by a contracting authority for the purposes of fulfilling its task of meeting needs in the general interest and those which are unrelated to that task. The fact that no such distinction is made is explained by the aim of those directives to avoid the risk of preference being given to national tenderers or applicants whenever a contract is awarded by the contracting authorities (see, by analogy, Case C-44/96 Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria and Others [1998] ECR I-73, paragraphs 32 and 33).

74 Next, the TV-EUmw/VKA, in particular Paragraph 6, was negotiated by, amongst others, representatives of the local authority employers. Those employers consequently exerted influence, at least indirectly, on the content of that paragraph.

75 Finally, the condition requiring the contracts at issue to be for pecuniary interest entails determining whether those contracts are of direct economic benefit to the local authority employers which conclude them (see, by analogy, Case C-451/08 Helmut Müller [2010] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 48 and 49).

76 In that regard, it should be noted that, in the field of local authority employment, it is apparent from Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA that the employer must implement the salary conversion measure with the public bodies referred to in the first sentence of that paragraph or, failing that, adopt methods for implementing that measure that are proposed by undertakings referred to in the second sentence thereof.

77 According to Paragraph 1(1) of the BetrAVG, an employer 'shall be responsible for ensuring the provision of the benefits he has guaranteed even where he does not implement the scheme directly'.

78 Thus, the local authority employer negotiates the terms of a group insurance contract with a professional insurer that is subject to specific prudential constraints guaranteeing its financial soundness. The services supplied by it enable the employer to take on its obligation of being responsible for the proper execution of this form of deferred earnings resulting from the salary conversion measure. The services also relieve the employer of management of that measure.

79 Under such a contract, the local authority employer pays to the body or undertaking at issue premiums deducted from the earnings to which the persons concerned are entitled from it, in return for receiving services that are inherent in its obligation, laid down in Paragraph 1(1) of the BetrAVG, of being responsible for ensuring the provision of the retirement benefits in favour of the workers who have opted, with its guarantee, for the salary conversion measure.

80 The fact that the ultimate recipients of the retirement benefits are the workers who have participated in that measure cannot call into question the fact that such a contract is for pecuniary interest.

81 The Federal Republic of Germany, supported on this point by the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden, submits, second, that the exception laid down for employment contracts in Article 1(a)(viii) of Directive 92/50 and Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18 extends to any provision of services the basis of which lies, as here, in a contract of that nature or in a collective agreement forming an integral part thereof and which, by its subject-matter, is covered by labour law.

82 However, having regard to the statements set out in paragraphs 4 and 12 of the present judgment, this exception, which as a derogation from application of the directives concerning public service contracts must be interpreted strictly, cannot extend to a provision of services which, as in the present case, is founded not on an employment contract but on a contract between an employer and an undertaking providing pensions and which is, moreover, unrelated to the particular concern expressed by the European Union legislature in recital 28 in the preamble to Directive 2004/18.

Determination of the value of the contract and exceeding of the application thresholds for Directives 92/50 and 2004/18

83 A preliminary point to note is that the Federal Republic of Germany has not contested the correctness of the thresholds of EUR 236 000 and EUR 211 000 applied by the Commission for the period of 2004 and 2005 and the period of 2006 and 2007 respectively for the purpose of defining, in the present case, the contracts which, because of their value, fall within the scope of Directive 92/50 or Directive 2004/18.

84 The Federal Republic of Germany contests, on the other hand, the correctness of the method of calculation adopted by the Commission in order to determine the critical size, in terms of the number of employees, beyond which local authority employers are considered to have concluded pension insurance contracts whose value equals or exceeds the relevant threshold for the purposes of the application of Directive 92/50 or of Directive 2004/18.

85 First, the Federal Republic of Germany maintains that the calculation of the value of the contract, within the meaning of those directives, must, in the present instance, be based exclusively on the amount of the management costs claimed by the undertaking in respect of payment for the services provided, and not on the total amount of the premiums paid in the context of salary conversion, as the latter amount is impossible to determine precisely at the time when the pension insurance contract is concluded.

86 However, in the case of contracts concerning insurance services within the meaning of Category No 6(a) of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 or Annex II A to Directive 2004/18, both the first indent of Article 7(4) of Directive 92/50 and Article 9(8)(a)(i) of Directive 2004/18 refer to the ‘premium payable’ as the element forming the basis for calculation of the estimated value of the contract in question.

87 In the case of occupational old-age pension services, the ‘estimated contract value’, within the meaning of the provisions referred to in the preceding paragraph of the present judgment, consequently corresponds, as the Commission has correctly considered, to the estimated value of the premiums, in the present instance, the estimated value of the contributions deducted, under salary conversion, from the earnings of the relevant workers in the local authority or local authority undertaking concerned and used to finance the ultimate occupational old-age pension benefits. Those premiums constitute, in the present instance, the principal consideration for the services provided by the body or undertaking concerned to the local authority employer in the context of the provision of those benefits.

88 In a context, such as that here, where it is not possible to indicate the total value of those premiums precisely at the time when the contract in question is awarded because of the choice left to each employee as to whether to participate in the salary conversion measure, and in the light of the duration of such a contract, which is long, or even indefinite, as the submissions at the hearing have confirmed, the second indent of Article 7(5) of Directive 92/50 and Article 9(8)(b)(ii) of Directive 2004/18 respectively require ‘the monthly [instalment/value] multiplied by 48’ to be taken as the basis for calculating the estimated value of that contract.

89 As the Advocate General has stated in point 150 of her Opinion, in the present case the Commission therefore acted correctly in – as the local authority employers concerned should have done – first basing its calculation on an estimate of the average monthly amount subject to earnings conversion per employee, multiplied by 48, then determining, in the light of the result of that multiplication, the number of employees individually participating in salary conversion needed in order to reach the relevant threshold for application of the European Union public procurement rules, and finally – on the basis of an estimate of the percentage of local authority employees participating in the salary conversion measure – defining the critical size, in terms of the number of employees, beyond which local authority employers awarded contracts reaching or exceeding that threshold.

90 Second, the Federal Republic of Germany contends that the Commission wrongly omitted in its calculations to take account of the fact, already highlighted at the stage of the pre-litigation procedure, that a number of local authority employers concluded, in implementing the salary conversion measure at the level of their own authority or undertaking, a number of contracts with separate bodies or undertakings. In its submission, this fact should have led the Commission to calculate the estimated contract value on the basis of each separate pension insurance contract entered into by the local authority employer.

91 However, whatever the grounds may be that led local authority employers to have recourse to that practice, and irrespective of whether the separate contracts at issue constitute – as the Commission asserts but the Federal Republic of Germany denies – framework agreements within the meaning of Article 1(5) of Directive 2004/18, it is apparent from the very wording of Article 9(1) of that directive, which lays down the general rule for calculating the estimated value of a public contract, that that calculation is based on the 'total amount' of the contract, as estimated by the contracting authority.

92 In the present instance, the relevant calculation must, therefore, be based on the estimated total amount of the contract for occupational old-age pensions at the level of the authority or undertaking concerned, calculated in terms of premiums connected with salary conversion.

93 As the Commission has submitted, in the case of such a contract, which inherently concerns a single matter, a calculation that depends, as the Federal Republic of Germany advocates, on the number of separate pension insurance contracts concluded by the local authority employer concerned would result in an artificial splitting of the contract, liable to remove it from the field of application of European Union public procurement legislation even though its total estimated value would be equal to or above the relevant threshold for application of that legislation.

94 Furthermore, such a calculation would fail to observe the principle of legal certainty as, at the time when these various potential separate contracts are concluded, their individual value cannot even be estimated, in light of the impossibility of forecasting, even approximately, the proportion of employees wishing to participate in the salary conversion measure who will subsequently choose each of the undertakings concerned. Such a calculation, based on a purely mathematical division of the estimated total value of the contract by the number of separate pension insurance contracts envisaged, might thus result in all of those pension insurance contracts being removed from the field of application of European Union public procurement rules whilst it would subsequently turn out that the value of some of them reaches or exceeds the relevant application threshold because of the number of participating employees and the amount of the premiums paid to the undertaking concerned.

95 Third, throughout the proceedings before the Court the Federal Republic of Germany has contested the correctness of the figures adopted by the Commission relating to the participation rate of local authority employees in the salary conversion measure.

96 At each stage of the proceedings before the Court, the Commission has sought to base its calculation on the most reliable figures provided by the Federal Republic of Germany so far as concerns the participation rate of local authority employees in the salary conversion measure, and this led it ultimately to restrict the subject-matter of its action to the effect indicated in paragraph 3 of the present judgment in relation to the period covering 2004 to 2007.

97 It should be stated first of all that the subject-matter of the present dispute may be extended to contract awards at issue that occurred after the date upon which the time-limit set in the reasoned opinion expired, namely 4 September 2006, given that those awards stem from conduct of the same kind as the awards referred to in the reasoned opinion (see, to this effect, Case 42/82 Commission v France [1983] ECR 1013, paragraph 20; Case 113/86 Commission v Italy [1988] ECR 607, paragraph 11; and Case C-236/05 Commission v United Kingdom [2006] ECR I-10819, paragraph 12).

98 On the other hand, the choice on the part of the Commission, in the calculations made by it in the present proceedings, to apply to the entire period concerned by its action the figures relating to 2006, the year in the course of which the time-limit set in the reasoned opinion expired, fails to have regard to the fact that the local authority employers which awarded disputed contracts in 2004 and 2005 could themselves have assessed the contract in question only on the basis of estimates relating to one or other of those two years. It was therefore incumbent upon the Commission to take account, in its calculations concerning, respectively, 2004 and 2005, of the figures relating to the corresponding year.

99 It is apparent from the particulars provided by the Federal Republic of Germany in its rejoinder that those figures are as follows, as regards, respectively, the average monthly amount subject to earnings conversion per employee and the percentage of local authority employees participating in the salary conversion measure:

– for 2004: EUR 77.95 and 1.4%;

– for 2005: EUR 89.14 and 1.76%.

100 In light of these data and having regard to the method of calculation which, as has been stated in paragraph 89 of the present judgment, is applicable in the context of the present case, it must be found that the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations as alleged in so far as pension insurance contracts were awarded directly, without a call for tenders at European Union level, to bodies or undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA:

– in 2004 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 4 505 employees;

– in 2005 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 3 133 employees; and

– in 2006 and in 2007 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 2 402 employees.

101 Fourth, the Federal Republic of Germany contends that the cities of Berlin, Bremen and Hamburg were wrongly considered to be members of a regional association of the VKA and, therefore, included within the field of application of the TV-EUmw/VKA.

102 In that regard, it is to be noted that, following explanations provided by the Federal Republic of Germany in the course of the present proceedings, the Commission withdrew the city of Berlin from the subject-matter of its action.

103 On the other hand, in the case of the cities of Bremen and Hamburg, the Federal Republic of Germany accepted that, as was apparent from the particulars provided by the Commission in its reply, these two cities were members, respectively, of the Kommunaler Arbeitgeberverband Bremen eV (Bremen Association of Local Authority Employers) and the Arbeitsrechtliche Vereinigung Hamburg eV (Hamburg Labour Law Association), which are members of the VKA.

104 Nor has the Federal Republic of Germany supported with any specific details the assertion in its rejoinder that the public service employees of those two cities do not fall within the field of application of TV-EUmw/VKA because of the special status of the members of each of the two regional associations referred to in the previous paragraph of the present judgment.

105 In view of all the foregoing considerations, it must be held that, in so far as service contracts in respect of occupational old-age pensions were awarded directly, without a call for tenders at European Union level, to bodies or undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, in 2004 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 4 505 employees, in 2005 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 3 133 employees and in 2006 and in 2007 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 2 402 employees, the Federal Republic of Germany failed to fulfil its obligations, until 31 January 2006 under Article 8, in conjunction with Titles III to VI, of Directive 92/50 and from 1 February 2006 under Article 20, in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55, of Directive 2004/18.

106 The action is dismissed as to the remainder.

Costs

107 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Under Article 69(3) of those rules, where each party succeeds on some and fails on other heads, the Court may order that the costs be shared or that the parties bear their own costs. In the present case, since the Commission and the Federal Republic of Germany have each been unsuccessful in respect of certain complaints, they must bear their own costs.

108 In accordance with the first subparagraph of Article 69(4) of the Rules of Procedure, the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden, which have intervened in the present proceedings, must bear their own costs.

On those grounds, the Court (Grand Chamber) hereby:

1. Declares that, in so far as service contracts in respect of occupational old-age pensions were awarded directly, without a call for tenders at European Union level, to bodies or undertakings referred to in Paragraph 6 of the Collective agreement on the conversion, for local authority employees, of earnings into pension savings (Tarifvertrag zur Entgeltungwandlung für Arbeitnehmer im kommunalen öffentlichen Dienst), in 2004 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 4 505 employees, in 2005 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 3 133 employees and in 2006 and in 2007 by local authorities or local authority undertakings which then had more than 2 402 employees, the Federal Republic of Germany failed to fulfil its obligations, until 31 January 2006 under Article 8, in conjunction with Titles III to VI, of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts and from 1 February 2006 under Article 20, in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55, of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts;

2. Dismisses the action as to the remainder;

3. Orders the European Commission, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden to bear their own costs.

VIII – Summary

IX – Conclusion

I – Introduction

1. The present case is a Treaty infringement action under Article 226 EC whereby the Commission seeks a declaration from the Court of Justice that, by reason of the fact that numerous large cities have concluded directly with pension scheme providers nominated by collective agreement framework agreements for occupational pension schemes for their employees without a European call for tenders, the Federal Republic of Germany had until 31 January 2006 failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (2) and, since 1 February 2006, has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts. (3)

2. The present proceedings are characterised in particular by the Commission's tactical decision not to focus, by way of example, on the contested contract awards of individual cities but to challenge, across the board, the award practice of all cities of a particular size. That procedural approach results necessarily in a particular emphasis attaching to evidential questions on the burden of proof and the Commission's duty to substantiate.

3. The present proceedings raise also numerous legal questions. Without doubt, the most difficult is that concerning the relationship between the rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining, on the one hand, and Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 which give effect to freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, on the other. As the alleged infringement of the procurement directives can be traced back, ultimately, to criteria established in collective agreements with the cities concerned, it may be questioned, in fact, whether the interplay between obligations based on fundamental freedoms, on the one hand, and the rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining, on the other, gives rise to a conflict, and, if so, what are the consequences.

4. As I will propose in this Opinion, the rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining must be regarded as elements of the general principles of Community law and accordingly as fundamental social rights. If in formal terms there is a finding of non-compliance with the procurement directives, clarification will thus be needed on how the obligation to respect the procurement directives may be reconciled with the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining.

II – Legal framework

A – Community law

1. Directive 92/50

5. According to Article 1(a)(viii) of Directive 92/50, employment contracts do not constitute public service contracts.

6. According to Article 8 of Directive 92/50, contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I A must be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI.

7. Title III of Directive 92/50 concerns the choice of award procedures and the rules governing design contests, Title IV contains common rules in the technical field, Title V common advertising rules and Title VI common rules on participation, criteria for qualitative selection and criteria for the award of contracts.

8. Annex I A to Directive 92/50 groups services within the meaning of Article 8 in 16 categories. The sixth category covers 'financial services', in particular 'insurance services' and 'banking services and securities dealing'.

2. Directive 2004/18

9. By reason of Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18, the directive does not apply to public service contracts which concern employment contracts.

10. According to Article 20 of Directive 2004/18, contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex II A must be awarded in accordance with Articles 23 to 55. Those articles contain rules on specifications and contract documents (Articles 23 to 27), on the different award procedures (Articles 28 to 34), on advertising and transparency (Articles 35 to 43) and on the conduct of the procedure (Articles 44 to 55).

11. Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 groups services in 16 categories. The sixth category covers ‘financial services’, in particular, ‘insurance services’ and ‘banking and investment services’.

B – National law

1. Gesetz zur Verbesserung der betrieblichen Altersversorgung (Law on the enhancement of occupational old-age pensions)

12. Paragraph 1 of the Gesetz zur Verbesserung der betrieblichen Altersversorgung of 19 December 1974 (4) (‘BetrAVG’) is worded:

‘Employer’s guarantee concerning an occupational old-age pension

(1) If an employee is given by his employer a guarantee of old-age, invalidity or survivor’s pension benefits on grounds of his employment relationship (occupational old-age pension), the provisions of this Law shall apply. A scheme for occupational old-age pensions may be implemented directly by an employer or through the conduit of one of the pension providers mentioned in Paragraph 1b(2) to (4). An employer shall be responsible for ensuring the provision of the benefits he has guaranteed even where he does not implement the scheme directly.

(2) Occupational old-age pension schemes shall also be deemed to exist where:

3. future entitlement to earnings is converted into an inchoate right, of equal value, to pension benefits (conversion of earnings), or

…’

13. Paragraph 1a of the BetrAVG provides as follows:

‘Right to an occupational old-age pension funded through conversion of earnings

(1) An employee shall have the right to demand from his employer that the future earnings to which he is entitled, to a maximum of 4% of the relevant ceiling for the assessment of contributions to the statutory pension fund, are paid into an occupational old-age pension scheme on the basis of conversion of earnings. The scheme for the implementation of an employee’s right shall be determined by agreement. If an employer is willing to allow for implementation through the conduit of a pension fund (Paragraph 1b(3)), the occupational old-age pension scheme shall be implemented by that body; otherwise an employee shall have the right to demand that his employer concludes a life assurance contract in his favour (Paragraph 1b(2)). …’

14. Paragraph 17 of the BetrAVG provides:

‘Personal scope and derogation by way of collective agreement

(3) Derogations from the provisions of Paragraphs 1a, 2 to 5, 16, the first sentence of Paragraph 18a, and Paragraphs 27 and 28 may be effected by collective agreement.

(5) To the extent that entitlement to earnings is based on a collective agreement, conversion of earnings may be effected in respect of that entitlement only to the extent that a collective agreement provides for or permits such conversion.'

2. Tarifvertrag zur Entgeltumwandlung für Arbeitnehmer/-innen im kommunalen öffentlichen Dienst (Collective agreement on the conversion of earnings for local authority employees)

15. Paragraph 2 of the Tarifvertrag zur Entgeltumwandlung für Arbeitnehmer/-innen im kommunalen öffentlichen Dienst of 18 February 2003 ('TV-EUmw/VKA') is worded as follows:

'Principle of conversion of earnings

As a supplement to the collectively agreed rules on occupational old-age pensions (ATV/ATV-K), the present collective agreement establishes principles governing the conversion of earnings components determined by collective agreement for the purposes of occupational old-age pensions.'

16. Paragraph 5 of the TV-EUmw/VKA provides:

'Exercise of the right to conversion of earnings

(1) An employee wishing to exercise his right to conversion of earnings shall serve on his employer, in a timely manner, written notice to that effect. An employee shall be bound by the agreement with his employer on the conversion of earnings for a period of no less than one year.

17. Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA provides:

'Implementation methods

Subject to the second and third sentences of this paragraph, conversion of earnings within the framework of the implementation methods provided for by the Gesetz zur Verbesserung der betrieblichen Altersversorgung (Law on the enhancement of occupational old-age pensions) shall be implemented with public bodies offering supplementary pension schemes. In the case of occupational old-age pension provision referred to in the first sentence, an employer may also adopt implementation methods offered by the Sparkassen finance group or local authority insurance companies. Should the need arise, a collective agreement at district level may provide for derogations from the first and second sentences of this paragraph.'

III – Facts

18. In the framework of efforts by the Federal Republic of Germany to encourage the development of funded occupational old-age pensions for employees, the BetrAVG includes provision for the conversion of earnings. In substance, that principle of conversion of earnings means that, at an employee's request, part of his future salary is used to fund an occupational old-age pension through the conversion of future entitlement to earnings into a right, of equal value, to pension benefits.

19. Although Paragraph 1a of the BetrAVG provides, in general, that employees have a right to an occupational old-age pension funded through the conversion of earnings within the limits provided by law, Paragraph 17(5) of the BetrAVG includes an extensive derogation from that principle. According to Paragraph 17(5), in relation to earnings which are based on a collective agreement, the conversion thereof may be effected only to the extent that a collective agreement provides for or permits such.

20. In that context, on 18 February 2003, the Vereinigung der kommunalen Arbeitgeberverbände (Federation of Local Authority Employer Associations; the 'VKA') and the service sector trade union ver.di – Vereinte Dienstleistungsgewerkschaft e.V. concluded the TV-EUmw/VKA, granting workers in municipal public sector employment a right to conversion of earnings. At the same time, the TV-EUmw/VKA established several features of that scheme for conversion of earnings which derogate from the provisions of the BetrAVG. The VKA concluded a collective agreement on the same terms with the civil service trade union dbb Tarifunion.

21. In contrast to the BetrAVG, the TV-EUmw/VKA expressly identifies the pension scheme providers with which occupational pension contributions may be accumulated by way of conversion of earnings. In that regard, Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA provides, in particular, that conversion of earnings must be implemented, as a rule, with public bodies offering supplementary pensions. However, notwithstanding that general determination, according to Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, local authority employers may decide also to cooperate with the Sparkassen finance group or local authority insurance companies. In addition, Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA provides expressly for the possibility that collective agreements at district level may adopt derogating provisions.

22. Taking account of the preliminary selection adopted in the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers with which conversion of earnings must be implemented, in simple terms, that conversion of earnings is effected, as a rule, in two steps. In order to facilitate conversion of earnings for individual local authority workers, as a first step, local authority employers conclude framework agreements with one or more pension scheme providers nominated by collective agreement. Typically, those framework agreements include the conditions on which local authority workers may opt, as a second step, for conversion of earnings.

IV – Pre-litigation procedure

23. Having become aware of the TV-EUmw/VKA as a result of a complaint, by letter of 12 October 2005, the Commission informed the Federal Republic of Germany that, by reason of the acts of local authorities and local authority undertakings in awarding service contracts for the provision of occupational old-age pension schemes directly to the organisations and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA without a European call for tenders, it might have contravened Article 8 in conjunction with Titles III to VI of Directive 92/50 and the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services established in Articles 43 EC and 49 EC and, in particular, the prohibition on discrimination inherent in those principles. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany was called upon, in accordance with Article 226 EC, to respond within a period of two months.

24. By its reply of 29 March 2006, the Federal Republic of Germany indicated that local authority bodies, in their capacity as employers, could not be regarded in functional terms, in the context of commitments made by collective agreement, as contracting authorities within the meaning of procurement law. In addition, the scheme for conversion of earnings and pension provision resulting from collective agreement and individual contracts of employment did not constitute a public contract. Moreover, the rules contested by the Commission were protected by the principle of the autonomy of collective bargaining.

25. By letter of 4 July 2006, the Commission delivered to the Federal Republic of Germany a reasoned opinion in accordance with the first paragraph of Article 226 EC. In order to take account of the amendment to Community law which had meanwhile been effected and, in particular, to take account of the fact that Directive 2004/18 had entered into force, the Commission supplemented its complaint by the allegation that on grounds of the contested conduct the Federal Republic of Germany had infringed, until 31 January 2006, the abovementioned provisions of Directive 92/50 and, since 1 February 2006, has infringed the corresponding provisions of Directive 2004/18. In addition, the Commission adhered to its view that the conduct contravened also the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services established in Articles 43 EC and 49 EC and, in particular, the prohibition on discrimination inherent in those principles.

26. In reply to the reasoned opinion, by letter of 15 November 2006, the Federal Republic of Germany reasserted its position. Moreover, it stressed that the implementing agreements concluded with pension providers could not be viewed in isolation. Instead, those agreements constituted part of employment law or, alternatively, were overlaid by such. However, in accordance with Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18, employment contracts were excluded from the scope of that directive. In addition, the Federal Republic of Germany annexed a legal opinion written by Professor Koenig and Mr Pfromm in response to the Commission's reasoned opinion in which those authors concluded that in the cases at issue here, having regard to the principle of autonomy in collective bargaining, there could be no obligation to invite tenders and that, in any event, neither the personal nor the material scope of the procurement directives was triggered. In that context, it was argued also that in individual cases the thresholds laid down in those directives were not satisfied.

27. In order to determine whether in the present case exclusion of the procurement rules was objectively justified and reasonable in order to attain the social policy objectives linked to the conversion of earnings, the Commission then sent to the Federal Republic of Germany a set of questions. As, in the Commission's view, the reply of the Federal Republic of Germany of 1 March 2007 was unconvincing, it moved to commence proceedings.

V – Procedure before the Court and forms of order sought by the parties

28. In its application, which was received at the Registry of the Court on 24 June 2008, the Commission claims that the Court should:

– declare that by reason of the fact that local authorities and local authority undertakings with more than 1 218 employees awarded public service contracts concerning occupational pension schemes without a European call for tenders directly to the organisations and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, the Federal Republic of Germany had, until 31 January 2006, infringed Article 8 in conjunction with Titles III to VI of Directive 92/50 and, since 1 February 2006, has infringed Article 20 in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55 of Directive 2004/18;

– order the Federal Republic of Germany to pay the costs.

29. In its defence received on 16 September 2008, the Federal Republic of Germany contends that the Court should:

– dismiss the action;

– order the Commission to pay the costs.

30. In its reply received on 27 October 2008, the Commission narrowed the scope of its action. In that regard, it contended, in particular, that the Court should declare that by reason of the fact that local authorities and local authority undertakings which had, in 2004 and 2005, more than 2 044 employees, in 2006 and 2007, more than 1 827 employees and, for awards since 2008, more than 1 783 employees, awarded public service contracts concerning occupational pension schemes without a European call for tenders directly to the organisations and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, the Federal Republic of Germany had, until 31 January 2006, infringed Article 8 in conjunction with Titles III to VI of Directive 92/50 and, since 1 February 2006, has infringed Article 20 in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55 of Directive 2004/18.

31. In its rejoinder of 12 December 2008, the Federal Republic of Germany repeated its contention that the Court should dismiss the action.

32. By order of the President of the Court of 5 December 2008, the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden were granted leave to intervene in support of the forms of order sought by the Federal Republic of Germany. They submitted written observations on 14 and 15 April 2009 to which the Commission responded with observations received on 30 June 2009.

33. At the hearing on 12 January 2010, the representatives of the Commission, the Federal Republic of Germany, the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden presented their oral arguments.

VI – Main arguments of the parties

34. Essentially, the Commission contests the compatibility with Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 of the preliminary selection made in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers. In the Commission's view, that provision of the collective agreement restricts local authority employers, in contravention of the directives, in their choice of pension scheme providers with which to implement conversion of earnings. Accordingly, to the extent that the relevant thresholds are satisfied, the award of an individual contract results necessarily in an infringement of those procurement directives.

35. In that regard, the Commission starts from the premiss that Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 apply to the framework agreements which local authority employers conclude with the selected pension scheme providers. More specifically, according to the Commission, those framework agreements must be categorised as public service contracts within the meaning of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, whose value, in the case of numerous German cities, exceeds the relevant thresholds. Therefore, on awarding such public service contracts, the provisions of those directives must be observed.

36. In the Commission's view, such assessment is not precluded by the fact that the preliminary selection in favour of certain pension scheme providers was established by collective agreement resulting from negotiations between the VKA and the trade unions. Community law, so it argues, does not accord any general privilege to the autonomy of collective bargaining. Moreover, the obligation to call for tenders does not depend on the characteristics of the individual employment relationships of local authority workers.

37. The German Government contests the Commission's action primarily with the argument that Community procurement law does not apply to a case such as the present. In its view, what is decisive is the fact that the selection procedure challenged by the Commission was adopted by the social partners and, accordingly, must be evaluated in the light of the principle of autonomy in collective bargaining. From that standpoint, it follows that the preliminary selection by collective agreement in favour of certain pension scheme providers contested in the present case and the implementation of such in the individual framework agreements, in fact, falls outside the scope of the procurement directives. To that extent, the German Government favours a corresponding application of the principles established in Albany (5) and Van der Woude. (6) Moreover, application of the procurement directives places public sector employers and their employees at a considerable disadvantage in comparison with private sector employers and their employees as this deprives the former group of the possibility to select pension scheme providers by way of collective agreement.

38. In relation to the facts, the German Government emphasises in that connection how collective agreements constitute the basis for and shape the right to conversion of earnings for workers in municipal public sector employment. In that regard, it stresses in particular that under the first sentence of Paragraph 1a(1) of the BetrAVG employees have a statutory right to the conversion of such earnings as are not based on a collective agreement. In that connection, in implementing the conversion of earnings, following a request by an employee, the choice of the pension scheme provider is, in principle, a matter for the employer. However, in relation to earnings which are based on a collective agreement, under Paragraph 17(5) of the BetrAVG, conversion may be effected only if, and, to the extent that, collective agreement provides for or permits such conversion. As the TV-EUmw/VKA provides for such possibility, in the view of the German Government, the scheme for the conversion of earnings at issue here is based entirely on collective agreement.

39. Moreover, it points out that the parties to the collective agreement took advantage of the possibility provided for in Paragraph 17(3) of the BetrAVG to derogate from various provisions of that law. In those circumstances, the preliminary selection – challenged by the Commission – in favour of certain pension scheme providers with which conversion of earnings must be implemented constitutes a restriction on the freedom of choice available to employers under Paragraph 1a(1) of the BetrAVG. Thus, employers are deprived of their authority to select and this is replaced by a consensual solution arrived at by the social partners. In that regard, selection of the pension scheme providers, in itself, reflects employee concerns.

40. Even if, in principle, the procurement directives apply to a case such as the present, in the view of the German Government, the framework agreements challenged by the Commission necessarily fall outside the material scope of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

41. Having regard to the fact that on the basis of a collective agreement local authority employers have been deprived of the authority to select pension scheme providers, according to the German Government, it would run contrary to the system to categorise those employers as contracting authorities within the meaning of the procurement directives. Moreover, so it argues the framework agreements concluded by local authority employers with pension scheme providers do not of themselves establish insurance relationships; instead, they establish simply the conditions on which employees may establish individual insurance contracts with pension scheme providers. In addition, employers generally conclude several such framework agreements with different pension scheme providers. Moreover, in its view, those framework agreements are not for pecuniary interest, the exclusion established in Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18 applies to the framework agreements and in calculating the value of the individual agreements the Commission relied on incorrect presumptions.

42. The Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden support Germany's contention that the action for failure to fulfil Treaty obligations should be dismissed.

43. The Kingdom of Denmark considers in particular the Danish system of occupational old-age pensions to be at risk if the Court were to conclude that agreements of a certain size concluded between public employers and trade unions concerning the investment of funds earmarked for the pensions of public sector employees must be subject to a compulsory call for tenders.

44. In their legal observations, both the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden stress the relevance of the abovementioned judgments in Albany and Van der Woude. In their view, even if, in principle, the procurement directives must be presumed to apply in situations such as those at issue here, account must be taken of the fact that the rules governing occupational old-age pensions derive directly from collective agreements. Moreover, all that has been agreed is which pension scheme provider should manage the pension savings. The funds, however, belong to employees alone and, as a result, no question arises of a contract for the provision of services to public sector employers. Moreover, Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18 applies, according to which the directive does not apply to employment contracts.

VII – Legal appraisal

A – Applicability of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 to collectively agreed framework agreements

45. The first question of principle which has to be answered in the present proceedings is whether the procurement directives may apply to collectively agreed framework agreements.

46. In that connection, there is considerable dispute on whether the framework agreements in question may fall within the primary law provisions on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

47. As Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 were adopted on the basis of powers included in the title of the EC Treaty on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, if those fundamental freedoms are not applicable to the framework agreements in question, on an interpretation of the procurement directives in conformity with primary law, it follows that those framework agreements necessarily are excluded also from the scope of the procurement directives.

48. The pleas advanced to counter the application of the fundamental freedoms to the framework agreements in question can be summarised in three lines of argument.

49. The first line of argument starts from the presumption that collective agreements – and, correspondingly, also framework agreements established by collective agreement – are excluded from the scope of competition rules under primary law. That exception in the field of competition law – according to such argument – can be applied in relation to fundamental freedoms and, as a result, collectively agreed framework agreements are excluded from the scope of fundamental freedoms.

50. A second line of argument, which, although not advanced systematically by the German Government, can be recognised as the underlying motive in some of its arguments, starts from the principle that fundamental freedoms do not apply to horizontal relations. In that connection, it may be queried in particular whether, having regard to the participation of worker representatives in collectively agreed accords, application of fundamental freedoms to collectively agreed framework agreements conflicts with the principle that fundamental freedoms do not apply to horizontal relations.

51. A third line of argument, advanced in the alternative, starts from the categorisation of the principle of autonomy in collective bargaining as a fundamental social right and the relationship between fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms. In that context, the argument is advanced in particular that collectively agreed framework agreements enjoy fundamental rights protection and, as a result, the substance of those agreements can no longer be measured against fundamental freedoms.

52. I will consider those three lines of argument in the following section.

1. Whether or not collective agreements are excluded from the scope of primary law competition rules and, if so, the applicability of such an exclusion to the fundamental freedoms

53. This first line of argument presumes, in my view, incorrectly, that, in principle, collectively agreed rules do not fall within the scope of primary law competition rules and that the exclusions from the scope of competition rules under primary law apply without more to the fundamental freedoms. Thus, that line of argument cannot be accepted.

(a) No exclusion from primary law competition rules for collective agreements

54. In three landmark judgments delivered on the same day in Albany, (7)Brentjens' (8) and Drijvende Bokken, (9) the Court ruled on the applicability of primary law competition rules to collective agreements and collectively agreed schemes.

55. Those cases concerned the compatibility of a national system of occupational pensions with the competition rules under primary law. The central question was whether the introduction of compulsory affiliation – at the request of employer and worker representatives in a given sector – to an occupational pension scheme for all undertakings in that sector could constitute an infringement of Article 10 EC in conjunction with Article 81 EC or an infringement of Article 86(1) EC in conjunction with Article 82 EC. In that connection, it was necessary to clarify whether, if at all, and, if so, under what conditions, a collective agreement between employers and workers in a given sector introducing a sectoral occupational pension scheme could fall within the scope of Article 81(1) EC.

56. In order to clarify the relationship between the competition rules of the EC Treaty and the collectively agreed scheme, the Court referred, first, to the objectives of a policy in the social sphere and social protection provided for in Article 2 EC and Article 3(1)(j) EC (10) and, in that connection, stressed that both the right of association and collective bargaining have been given express consideration in primary law and in the agreement on social policy. (11)

57. The Court then stated that certain restrictions of competition are inherent in collective agreements between organisations representing employers and workers. However, the social policy objectives pursued by such agreements would be seriously undermined if management and labour were subject to Article 81(1) EC when seeking jointly to adopt measures to improve conditions of work and employment. (12) As a consequence of those considerations, the Court concluded that, from an interpretation of the provisions of the Treaty as a whole which is both effective and consistent, it follows that agreements concluded in the context of collective negotiations between management and labour in pursuit of such objectives must, by virtue of their nature and purpose, be regarded as falling outside the scope of Article 81(1) EC. (13)

58. Accordingly, in those judgments, the Court held that collective agreements – and, thus, also collectively agreed schemes and decisions – are excluded from the scope of Article 81 EC on satisfying a dual condition; that is, the agreement must (1) have been concluded in the framework of collective negotiations (14) and (2) with a view to improving conditions of work and employment. (15)

59. As the non-applicability of the competition rules in relation to collectively agreed accords does not follow automatically, but must be determined in an individual case, the Court did not recognise in those judgments any exclusion from the competition rules under primary law for collective agreements.

Instead, having regard to the primary law consideration given to collective agreements in the field of employment law and, accordingly, in the framework of an interpretation taking account of the Treaty's scheme, the Court held Article 81 EC to be subject to an inherent limitation in relation to collective agreements with a given purpose. (16)

60. Such assessment is not precluded by the fact that both in Albany, Brentjens' and Drijvende Bokken and in the later case of Van der Woude (17) the Court examined only cursorily whether the collective agreements were concluded with a view to improving conditions of work and employment. Naturally, to eliminate all suspicion of abuse of the freedom granted to the social partners in the area of competition law, a more rigorous analysis on the substance of the collectively agreed provisions in question would have been advisable in those cases, too. (18) None the less, in the framework of an overall assessment of the scheme of those judgments, the conclusion remains that only collective agreements with a given purpose were excluded from the scope of Article 81(1) EC. (19)

61. Against that background, Advocate General Fennelly was correct, in my view, to observe in his Opinion in Van der Woude that, as an exclusion from the general field of application of Article 81 EC, the scope of the 'Albany exclusion' must be narrowly construed. Consequently, collective agreements which appreciably affect competition may always be challenged on the basis that the agreement does not pursue a genuine social objective because the restrictions resulting from it, or from its application, go beyond what is required by the pursuit of its objective. (20) Naturally, that necessarily presupposes a substantive examination of the criterion of whether the collective agreements concerned or the individual provisions of such were, in fact, concluded with a view to improving conditions of work and employment.

62. In the light of the foregoing, I conclude that in Albany, Brentjens' and Drijvende Bokken the Court did not establish a general exception from the competition rules under primary law for collective agreements. Instead, those judgments must be interpreted as determining that Article 81 EC is subject to an inherent primary law limitation in relation to collective agreements with a given purpose.

(b) No general concordance between the scope of the primary law on competition and that of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services

63. In its argument, the Federal Republic of Germany presupposes that the limitations and exceptions established in competition law apply, as a rule, to the fundamental freedoms. Against that background, it contends in particular that the Court should apply to the present case per analogiam – and, accordingly, without any assessment taking account of the particular features of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services – the reasoning and principles of Albany, Brentjens' and Drijvende Bokken.

64. In my opinion, that view put forward by the German Government cannot be accepted.

65. Although both the rules within the field of freedom of establishment and freedom to provides services and the rules in the field of freedom of competition take account of the objective of completing the internal market, the fact that an agreement or activity is excluded from the scope of the competition rules does not necessarily mean that it is excluded also from the scope of the rules on freedom of movement. (21)

66. In consistent case-law, the Court has held that although an agreement or an activity may be included within the scope of the provisions on free movement at the same time it may fall outside the scope of the provisions on competition and vice versa. (22)

67. Therefore, according to the case-law of the Court, there is no mandatory concordance between the scope of the competition rules under primary law and that of the fundamental freedoms. The fact that collectively agreed rules aimed at improving the conditions of work and employment, in accordance with Albany, Brentjens' and Drijvende Bokken, do not fall within the scope of Article 81 EC, thus, does not imply necessarily that such collectively agreed rules are excluded also from the scope of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

68. Simply in the alternative, I wish to add that, even if the relationship between the principle of autonomy in collective bargaining and the fundamental freedoms must be structured similarly to the relationship between the principle of autonomy in collective bargaining and competition law as established by primary law, this would not imply that the requirements laid down in Albany, Brentjens' and Drijvende Bokken could be applied without more to the present case. Instead, giving due regard to the recognition of the principle of autonomy in collective bargaining as a fundamental right, (23) the criteria and reasoning set out in those judgments in relation to competition law would need to be evaluated. (24)

2. The limited horizontal effects of fundamental freedoms

69. Nor is the applicability of freedom to provide services and freedom of establishment in the field of collective bargaining precluded by the argument – conceivable in the present case – that fundamental freedoms do not apply to horizontal relations.

70. According to that line of argument, the framework agreements in question result, ultimately, from a collective agreement negotiated between public sector employers and worker representatives. Taking account of the fact that the principles of freedom to provide services and freedom of establishment do not apply to horizontal relations, the participation of workers in the conclusion of the collective agreements precludes, in principle, so it is argued, the application of provisions concerning those fundamental freedoms to collective agreements and implementing agreements subordinated thereto.

71. That line of argument must be countered, first, by stating that the TV-EUmw/VKA was concluded between the VKA and trade unions. Given the fact that local authority employers, that is, public bodies subject to the requirements of the fundamental freedoms participated in the conclusion of the collective agreement, one could describe the effects produced by the fundamental freedoms, here, as having, at the most, an indirectly horizontal character to the disadvantage of the trade unions also participating in the collective bargaining process.

72. In addition, in that connection, regard must be had to the settled case-law of the Court, according to which Articles 39 EC, 43 EC and 49 EC do not apply only to the actions of public authorities but extend also to rules of any other nature aimed at regulating in a collective manner gainful employment, self-employment and the provision of services. (25)

73. That inclusion of collective rules on employment within the scope of the fundamental freedoms is justified by the fact that working conditions in the different Member States are governed sometimes by provisions laid down by law or regulation and sometimes by collective agreements and other acts concluded or adopted by private persons. Exclusion of collective rules on employment from the scope of the fundamental freedoms would carry with it the risk that application of obligations based on one of the fundamental freedoms established under primary law would result in inequalities. (26)

74. In the light of those considerations, I conclude that no arguments can be derived from the principle by which fundamental freedoms do not apply to horizontal relations which preclude the application of provisions on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services to collectively agreed framework agreements.

3. Categorisation of the rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining as fundamental social rights and their relationship to fundamental freedoms

75. Nor am I persuaded by the argument that because the fundamental right to autonomy in collective bargaining serves as the basis for the specification of the conditions of employment of local authority workers in the TV-EUmw/VKA the substance of such collective agreement and its subordinate agreements falls outside the scope of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

76. It is settled case-law that fundamental rights form an integral part of the general principles of law the observance of which the Court ensures. (27) In determining those fundamental rights, the Court draws inspiration from the constitutional traditions common to the Member States and from the guidelines supplied by international instruments for the protection of fundamental rights on which the Member States have collaborated or to which they are signatories.

77. The right to bargain collectively is recognised both by various international instruments which the Member States have signed or cooperated in – such as the European Social Charter signed in Turin on 18 October 1961, (28) to which, moreover, express reference is made in Article 136 EC – and by instruments developed by those Member States at Community level or in the context of the European Union, such as the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers adopted at the meeting of the European Council held in Strasbourg on 9 December 1989, (29) which is also referred to in Article 136 EC, and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union proclaimed in Nice on 7 December 2000. (30)

78. Against that background, it is beyond question that the right to bargain collectively and the autonomy, accorded to the parties to that process, inherent in that right must be recognised also in the Community legal order as fundamental rights which form an integral part of the general principles of Community law. (31)

79. Moreover, by the Treaty of Lisbon – not relevant, ratione temporis, in the present case – the primary law enshrinement of the right to bargain collectively was strengthened by the fact that Article 6 TEU declares the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union to have binding legal force. By that general reference to the charter, the right to bargain collectively, described in Article 28 of that charter, is now expressly incorporated in primary law. (32)

80. However, the fact that the right to bargain collectively and of the parties to autonomy in that connection are recognised as fundamental rights does not permit the conclusion, without more, that the substance of the collective agreements, made in exercise of those fundamental rights, and the agreements subordinate thereto automatically fall outside the scope of the fundamental freedoms.

81. In the case of a conflict between a fundamental right and a fundamental freedom, both legal positions must be presumed to have equal status. That general equality in status implies, first, that, in the interests of fundamental rights, fundamental freedoms may be restricted. However, second, it implies also that the exercise of fundamental freedoms may justify a restriction on fundamental rights. (33)

82. Consequently, categorisation of the rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining as fundamental rights does not result in the automatic or complete exclusion from the scope of the provisions on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services either for the collective agreements concluded in the exercise of those rights or for the subordinate agreements concluded in the implementation thereof.

83. From that, it inexorably follows that the argument according to which both collective agreements, negotiated through the exercise of the fundamental right to bargain collectively and the fundamental right to autonomy in such a process, and subordinate agreements thereto, eo ipso, fall outside the scope of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services and secondary law based thereupon is unpersuasive.

84. Instead, if a conflict between such fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights is established, it must be determined whether, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, fundamental freedoms may justify a restriction on the fundamental right to bargain collectively and the fundamental right to autonomy in that process or, conversely, whether those fundamental rights demand that the scope of those fundamental freedoms and the secondary law based thereupon must be limited.

4. Interim conclusion

85. In the light of my observations above, I conclude that, in principle, collectively agreed framework agreements fall within the scope of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services. Thus, in principle, the framework agreements in question fall also within the scope of procurement directives based on those fundamental freedoms, naturally, subject always to the proviso that the conditions for applying such directives are satisfied.

86. If it is established that Directive 92/50 or Directive 2004/18 has been contravened as a result of a collectively agreed framework agreement, regard must be had, however, to the special status of the rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining as fundamental social rights. In that regard, it must be determined in the circumstances of the individual case whether that non-observance of the procurement directives results from exercising the fundamental social rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining, and, if so, whether restricting the exercise of such fundamental social rights as a result of obligations established by the procurement directives may be regarded as justified having regard to the fundamental freedoms.

87. In the light of those considerations, in the following analysis I will examine, first, whether the collectively agreed framework agreements at issue are compatible with Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. Thereafter, I will examine how a conflict between obligations resulting from the procurement directives and the freedom to exercise the fundamental right to bargain collectively and the fundamental right to autonomy in collective bargaining may be resolved.

B – Compatibility of the framework agreements at issue with Directives 92/50 and 2004/18

88. The Commission alleges an infringement of Directive 92/50 and of Directive 2004/18 said to result from the fact that numerous local authorities and local authority undertakings awarded service contracts concerning occupational pension schemes for their employees without a European call for tenders directly to the bodies and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA.

89. For the purposes of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, public service contracts are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a contracting authority and an economic operator and having as their principal object the provision of services.

90. In the present case, the parties disagree, in particular, on whether, in implementing the preliminary selection established by collective agreement, local authorities acted as contracting authorities within the meaning of the procurement directives. In addition, there is disagreement on whether the agreements concluded between local authorities and pension scheme providers may be classified as contracts for pecuniary interest which have as their object the provision of services and which exceed the relevant thresholds.

91. I will examine both of those main issues in the following analysis.

1. Categorisation of the cities as contracting authorities

92. The Federal Republic of Germany rejects the categorisation of the cities concerned as contracting authorities for the purposes of the procurement directives with the argument that in selecting pension scheme providers those cities merely implement the requirements of the collective agreement and, hence, do not take an ‘independent’ decision. In addition, so they argue, the element of procurement to the benefit of public authorities is absent because in terms of its legal consequences and economic effects the conversion of earnings must be classified as pertaining to the employee sphere.

93. By that argument, the Federal Republic of Germany calls, in essence, for a functional interpretation of the concept of a public authority with the objective – as a result of a restrictive interpretation of that element – of narrowing the scope of the procurement directives in cases such as the present. That argument cannot be accepted.

94. At the outset, it must be recalled that the Community rules on public procurement were adopted in pursuance of the establishment of the internal market, in which freedom of movement is ensured and restrictions on competition are eliminated. (34) In that connection, the Court has identified that the widest possible opening-up to competition in all Member States for public procurement constitutes one of the primary objectives of the procurement directives. (35)

95. Although it is correct to assert that in consistent case-law the Court has held that the concept of a contracting authority must be interpreted not in formal but in functional terms, (36) it must be stressed in that context that such case-law testifies to the efforts of the Court to break up closed national procurement markets and – in accordance with the objectives stated in the recitals in the preambles to the procurement directives – to open them to the common market. (37)

96. Accordingly, by its functional interpretation of the concept of a contracting authority, the objective pursued by the Court is to ensure the effective attainment of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in the field of public contracts. To that end, the Court has broadly interpreted the material scope of the procurement directives, and, in that regard, for the purposes of classifying a national body (in functional terms) as a contracting authority for the purposes of the procurement rules it is irrelevant whether under relevant national rules that characteristic is linked to certain institutional features. (38)

97. Consequently, case-law on the 'functional' notion of a contracting authority facilitates the general purpose of the procurement directives, that is, in coordinating the procedures for awarding public contracts, to eliminate barriers to the freedom to provide services and goods and, as a result, also to protect the interests of traders established in a Member State who wish to offer goods or services to contracting authorities established in another Member State. (39) In so doing, both the risk of preference being given to national tenderers or applicants whenever a contract is awarded by the contracting authorities and the possibility that a body financed or controlled by the State, regional or local authorities or other bodies governed by public law may choose to be guided by considerations other than economic ones may be avoided. (40)

98. Although the functional interpretation of the concept of a contracting authority in those terms results, on the whole, in an extension of the material scope of the procurement directives, in exceptional cases it may result also in the non-applicability of those directives to contracts notwithstanding the fact that in formal terms these were awarded by a contracting authority and the remaining requirements for the application of the procurement directives also appear to be fulfilled.

99. A clear example of this is to be found in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria in which the Court held that a contract awarded by a contracting authority, which in principle falls within the scope of the procurement directives, ceases to be regarded as a public contract if it is established that, from the outset, the whole of the project at issue fell within the objects of an undertaking not subject to procurement law and the works contracts relating to that project were entered into by the contracting authority on behalf of that undertaking. (41)

100. The criterion for the non-applicability of the procurement rules applied in Mannesmann Anlagenbau Austria implies, therefore, that the award decision demonstrably must be taken by a private awarding body acting on its own behalf and on condition that it bears the entire cost. Given that in such a configuration, although in formal terms the contracting authority awards the contract, but neither took nor influenced the decisions on which that contract is based, that precludes the risk that in awarding the contract such contracting authority gives preference to national tenderers or applicants or is guided by considerations other than economic ones. (42)

101. In the light of the considerations above, I am unpersuaded by the argument advanced by the Federal Republic of Germany, namely that in their selection of pension scheme providers local authorities merely implement the requirements of the collective agreement and, accordingly, do not act as contracting authorities.

102. First, it must be observed that the collective agreement was concluded between the VKA and the trade unions. In that process, as the umbrella association for local authorities and local authority undertakings in Germany, the VKA represented the interests of local authority employers for collective bargaining and employment relations purposes. That implies necessarily that local authority employers participated, at least, indirectly, in establishing the negotiating positions for which, subsequently, in the framework of collective bargaining with the trade unions, the VKA sought to find acceptance and which contributed, ultimately, to the basis for the collectively bargained consensus. Against that background, local authority employers could influence, at least, indirectly, the preliminary selection in favour of certain pension scheme providers agreed in the TV-EUmw/VKA.

103. In the light of the fact that local authority employers could influence, at least, indirectly, the negotiations on the collective agreement and, thus, also the outcomes achieved in the TV-EUmw/VKA, their categorisation as contracting authorities for the purposes of the procurement directives cannot be questioned by pointing to the requirements and obligations established by the collective agreement.

104. Nor is the argument convincing that in the present case, from a functional point of view, local authorities may not be regarded as contracting authorities for the purposes of the procurement directives because in terms of its legal consequences and economic effects the conversion of earnings must be classified as pertaining to the employee sphere.

105. Even if it is correct that local authority employers make no contributions whatsoever to occupational pension savings accumulated through conversion of earnings, such finding would not of itself suffice to remove the contracts made between local authority employers and pension scheme providers from the scope of the procurement directives.

106. Admittedly, the risk of preference being given by contracting authorities to national firms and bidders may be diminished when conclusion of the contract by the contracting authority constitutes the outcome of negotiations between the public sector employer and one or more workers and only those workers bear the economic consequences of the conclusion of the contract. In such a case, workers have, as a rule, a particular interest in ensuring that the most economically advantageous outcome is achieved. Regardless of the question whether that factor alone eliminates the risk that the outcome of the negotiations gives preference to national firms, for the purposes of assessing the present case it suffices to observe that the negotiations on the collective agreement were conducted on the workers' side by trade unions. Although those trade unions represent the workers and, thus, may act as a counterweight to the natural tendency of contracting authorities to favour national firms, (43) trade unions do not bear in a personal sense the financial consequences of the conversion of earnings requested by local authority workers. Simply for that reason, the fact that trade unions participated in the negotiations resulting in the conclusion of the TV-EUmw/VKA is insufficient to place the selection decisions – predetermined by collective agreement – taken by contracting authorities outside the scope of the procurement directives.

107. In the light of those considerations, I conclude that the local authorities which in implementation of the TV-EUmw/VKA concluded contracts with one or more of the pension scheme providers mentioned therein acted as contracting authorities for the purposes of the procurement directives.

2. Categorisation of the framework agreements as contracts for pecuniary interest within the scope of the procurement directives

(a) Observations on the duty to substantiate and the burden of proof

108. By means of a multiplicity of arguments, the German Government contests the categorisation of the framework agreements concluded between local authorities and pension scheme providers as contracts for pecuniary interest within the scope of the procurement directives. In that regard, it stresses in particular that the framework agreements establish merely the conditions on which workers may subsequently conclude individual insurance contracts with pension scheme providers. In that connection, the German Government emphasises also that consideration is provided not by local authorities but by employees. In its view, in the absence of an economic exchange between pension scheme providers and local authorities the framework agreement is not for pecuniary interest. And even if there were to be pecuniary interest, the Commission has not adduced proof that the thresholds are satisfied. In addition, so it argues, the exception for employment contracts provided for in Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18 extends to the framework agreements in question.

109. In the present proceedings, analysis and assessment of those arguments is considerably hampered by the fact that very little specific information on the actual framework agreements concluded by individual local authorities has been produced to the Court. Particularly problematic, in that respect, is the approach taken by the Commission in relation to evidential matters. In wording its action, the Commission limited itself to a generalised challenge, on the basis of statistical information, to the award practice of all German cities of a certain size.

110. None of the framework agreements concluded by those cities were attached to the application. Instead, the Commission limited its evidence to the production of some general information sheets, information to members and specimen application forms issued by various pension scheme providers.

111. Against that background, in the present proceedings it remains unresolved, inter alia, on what date each of the framework agreements at issue was concluded. Accordingly, it is uncertain whether those framework agreements must be assessed in the light of Directive 92/50 or, instead, in the light of Directive 2004/18. The determining factor is always the legal position at the time when the operations with procurement law relevance took place. (44) As in the absence of detailed information on the conclusion of the framework agreements in question that time cannot be determined, in the present proceedings, a finding that the procurement rules have been infringed may be reached only where conduct would constitute an infringement both of Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18.

112. In that regard, according to settled case-law it falls to the Commission to prove, in fact, the alleged failure to fulfil Treaty obligations. It is the Commission's responsibility to place before the Court the information needed to enable the Court to establish that the obligation has not been fulfilled. In so doing, the Commission may not rely on any presumptions. (45)

113. Against that background, it is for the Commission to produce sufficient evidence to discern an infringement. When that has been done, it is incumbent on the Member State to contest substantively and in detail the information produced and the consequences thereof. (46)

114. In the light of those considerations, in the following analysis, I will examine the Commission's argument and the counterarguments advanced by the German Government.

(b) Applicability of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 to framework agreements

115. Although not one single framework agreement at issue between a city and a pension scheme provider has been produced, the German Government and the Commission agree on the fact that such framework agreements have been concluded by German cities. However, the German Government argues that the conclusion of those agreements cannot be regarded as the award of public contracts because the contractual relationship relevant for the purposes of the procurement rules is established only in the framework of an individual employee's participation in conversion of earnings.

116. By this argument, the German Government emphasises the two-step construction of the conversion of earnings procedure. That procedure is particularly characterised by the fact that, as a first step, local authority employers conclude framework agreements with one or more pension scheme providers selected in accordance with Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA. Such framework agreements typically include the conditions on which, as a second step, local authority employees may opt for conversion of earnings.

117. To the extent that the material and personal conditions for application are satisfied, both under Directive 92/50 and under Directive 2004/18 framework agreements constitute contracts which are subject to a compulsory call for tenders.

118. Directive 92/50 does not govern expressly the conclusion of framework agreements. However, it must be observed that in Commission v Greece (47) the Court confirmed the applicability of Council Directive 77/62/EEC of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (48) to framework agreements. In the light of that judgment, it must be presumed that, in principle, framework agreements fall also within the scope of Directive 92/50. Directive 2004/18 expressly provides for and governs the conclusion of framework agreements in Article 32.

119. Although framework agreements fall, in principle, within the scope of the procurement directives, both the Court in Commission v Greece (49) and the legislature in formulating that principle in Directive 2004/18 focused primarily on framework agreements which include the terms for subsequent contracts between the contracting authority and the economic operators concerned. (50) However, the present proceedings concern framework agreements establishing the terms for the subsequent conversion of earnings by employees of the contracting authorities.

120. Thus, it may be questioned whether Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 must be interpreted as meaning that they include also the framework agreements at issue, although in substance these establish terms for insurance contracts which may be entered into by local authority employees.

121. In my view, in the specific context of the present proceedings, that question must be answered in the affirmative.

122. The crucial element in that regard is the fact that the conversion of earnings procedure is structured such that the framework agreements establish not only the terms for any conversion of earnings by local authority employees but determine also the organisations with which local authority employees may implement conversion of earnings.

123. As I have already stated, the free movement of goods and services and the widest possible opening-up to competition in all Member States constitute the primary objectives of Community legislation on public procurement. (51) In that connection, both the risk of preference being given to national tenderers or applicants whenever a contract is awarded by the contracting authorities and the possibility that a body financed or controlled by the State, regional or local authorities or other bodies governed by public law may choose to be guided by considerations other than economic ones may be avoided. (52)

124. In the light of those objectives, in analysing the framework agreements in question for procurement law purposes, the crucial factor is that in concluding a framework agreement a local authority employer determines with which pension scheme provider its employees may, as a second step, implement the conversion of earnings. Accordingly, the selection – relevant for procurement law purposes – of one or more economic operators is effected on the conclusion of the framework agreement between the local authority employer and the pension scheme provider concerned.

125. Against that background, I conclude that the risk of preference being given to national tenderers or applicants clearly arises on conclusion of the framework agreements at issue. Because local authority employees are bound by decisions of local authority employers taken in favour of a pension scheme provider, they are limited to electing whether to establish an insurance relationship on the basis of the framework agreement and may not determine with whom. That latter decision was taken by local authority employers on the conclusion of the framework agreement and, as a result, in the specific context of the present proceedings, those framework agreements, too, must be included within the scope of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

126. As a final argument contesting the applicability of Directive 2004/18 to the framework agreements at issue, the Federal Republic of Germany contends, in the alternative, that the limitation on the term of framework agreements subject to a compulsory call for tenders to a maximum of four years, provided for in Article 32(2) of that directive, is inappropriate for the creation of collective insurance schemes. However, that objection must be rejected as unfounded simply by reason of the fact that under that provision that maximum term of four years does not apply if such term is incompatible with the object of the framework agreement.

(c) Whether the framework agreements are for pecuniary interest

127. According to the German Government, conversion of earnings is funded, ultimately, by employees alone. Against that background, it argues that the framework agreements are not for pecuniary interest within the meaning of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

128. Regardless of how, in the context of occupational pensions funded by conversion of earnings, in practical terms, the transfer of contributions or premiums is effected, it is certain that by such scheme, ultimately, an employee's future earnings are used for the purposes of his occupational pension. Thus, from an economic point of view, employees, and not contracting authorities, bear the costs of occupational pensions. (53) Therefore, from the perspective of procurement law, a scheme of third-party funding must be presumed, in which not the contracting authority but the local authority employee concerned confers an economic benefit on the pension scheme provider and, in return, acquires to the same value entitlements to future pension.

129. In my view, the fact that the monetary benefit, ultimately, is conferred not by contracting authorities but by local authority employees does not conclusively preclude the categorisation of the framework agreements concluded by contracting authorities as being for pecuniary interest.

130. The purpose of requiring a pecuniary interest is to ensure that those arrangements which do not concern economic activities such as, for example, charitable provision are excluded from the scope of the procurement directives. (54) If, on the other hand, it is clear that an arrangement has an inherent economic purpose, Community procurement law, in principle, applies.

131. In that connection, the Court has already clarified that for the purposes of categorisation as a public contract within the meaning of the procurement directives it is irrelevant whether the contracting authority uses public resources to pay the contractor. (55)

132. In addition, in Carbotermo and Consorzio Alisei, in identifying the conditions under which an in-house award falls outside the scope of Community procurement law, the Court emphasised that in determining whether an undertaking's activities are devoted primarily to a contracting authority it is irrelevant who pays the undertaking in question, whether it be that authority or third parties. (56) If, according to that line of case-law, payments by third parties can be relevant in determining the applicability of a derogation from procurement law, that must apply a fortiori in determining the applicability of procurement law itself. (57)

133. In the light of the above considerations, I conclude that the benefit conferred by local authority employees in the framework of the conversion of earnings suffices to classify the framework agreements concluded by contracting authorities with the pension scheme providers concerned as being for pecuniary interest within the meaning of the procurement directives. (58) Consequently, it is unnecessary for contracting authorities to constitute, in economic terms, the ultimate supplier of the pecuniary consideration.

(d) Non-applicability of the exclusion for employment contracts

134. According to Article 1(a)(viii) of Directive 92/50, employment contracts do not constitute public service contracts. Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18 provides, similarly, that that directive does not apply to public service contracts which concern employment contracts.

135. In the view of the German Government, those exclusions extend to the framework agreements in question. It contends that the framework agreements are based on employment relationships with the consequence that their object concerns to that extent employment contracts.

136. I am unpersuaded by that argument.

137. By Article 1(a)(viii) of Directive 92/50 and Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18, the legislature has stated that provision of services may fall within Community procurement law only where this is effected on the basis of contracts. If, on the other hand, services are provided in fulfilment of an employment contract, these are not intended to be covered by procurement law. (59)

138. That explicit exclusion of employment contracts from the scope of the procurement directives can be explained by the fact that conclusion of an employment contract establishes a considerably more narrow legal relationship than the conclusion of a contract for the general provision of services. Against that background, employers should not be precluded by the procurement rules from taking account of subjective matters and impressions when taking hiring decisions. (60)

139. Although there is no single definition of the concept of a worker – nor, consequently, of an employment contract – in Community law, with that definition varying according to the area in which it is to be applied, (61) in my view, the consistent case-law of the Court defining the concept of a worker for the purposes of Article 39 EC may serve as the basis for the definition of an employment contract for the purposes of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. (62) According to that case-law, a relationship governed by a contract of employment may be considered to exist only where a person undertakes, for a certain period of time, to perform services for and under the direction of another person in return for which he receives remuneration. (63)

140. Against that background, an agreement between an awarding body and a service provider may be categorised as an employment contract for the purposes of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 only if the service provider undertakes, for a certain period of time, to perform services for and under the direction of an awarding body in return for which it receives remuneration.

141. It is beyond dispute that such a situation does not apply in the case of the framework agreements in question. Thus, in the present proceedings, it is immediately apparent that the exclusion for employment contracts established in Article 1(a)(viii) of Directive 92/50 and Article 16(e) of Directive 2004/18 does not apply.

(e) Thresholds under Directives 92/50 and 2004/18

(i) Determination of the relevant thresholds

142. Both Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 apply only to public service contracts the estimated value of which net of value added tax (VAT) is in excess of certain thresholds established in those directives.

143. As those thresholds are regularly revised, first of all, it must be clarified which threshold was relevant in relation to the framework agreements in question. For those purposes, the threshold must be established which applied at the time of the contractual negotiations. (64)

144. The case-file does not include any information on the dates at which the individual local authority employers commenced negotiations with the relevant pension scheme providers or the dates on which framework agreements were concluded. Having regard to the fact that the TV-EUmw/VKA has been in force since 1 January 2003 and, thus, starting from the first half of 2003 negotiations could be held with a view to concluding framework agreements in accordance with that collective agreement, (65) for the purposes of the present proceedings, all the thresholds which applied from 1 January 2003 to 4 September 2006 (the date on which the period for compliance with the reasoned opinion expired) must be considered relevant. These are:

(1) the threshold according to Article 7(1)(a) of Directive 92/50, as amended by European Parliament and Council Directive 97/52/EC of 13 October 1997 amending Directives 92/50/EEC, 93/36/EEC and 93/37/EEC concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts, public supply contracts and public works contracts respectively: (66)the equivalent value in ecus of 200 000 SDR;

(2) the threshold according to Article 7(b) of Directive 2004/18: EUR 249 000;

(3) the threshold according to Article 7(b) of Directive 2004/18, as amended by Commission Regulation (EC) No 1874/2004 of 28 October 2004 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts: (67)EUR 236 000;

(4) the threshold according to Article 7(b) of Directive 2004/18, as amended by Commission Regulation (EC) No 2083/2005 of 19 December 2005 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts: (68)EUR 211 000.

145. In its application, the Commission attempted to circumvent the problem of determining the relevant thresholds by referring to the date on which the period of two months for compliance with the reasoned opinion expired. As the reasoned opinion was received by the Federal Republic of Germany on 4 July 2006, on the Commission's argument, the threshold in force on 4 September 2006 of EUR 211 000 applied. (69)

146. That approach taken by the Commission is not supported by the procurement directives and ignores the essence of procurement law. Consequently, such approach cannot be followed. (70) Instead, in determining the applicable threshold, in a case such as the present, reference must be had to the date of the contractual negotiations. (71)

147. As in the present case that date cannot be determined, in assessing whether the framework agreements in question satisfy the relevant thresholds, the highest threshold applicable in the period at issue must be presumed. That is EUR 249 000.

(ii) Absence of proof that the framework agreements exceed the relevant threshold

148. The framework agreements at issue are characterised by the fact that at the time of the negotiations leading to their conclusion it was impossible to ascertain how many local authority employees would opt, ultimately, for conversion of earnings and, in the event of such option, the conditions under which conversion would be effected. Against that background, the procurement directives provide that the value of such framework agreements must be determined on the basis of an estimate of the expected contract value at the date of the contractual negotiations. (72)

149. In relation to public service contracts without a fixed term or with a term greater than 48 months for which a total price is not indicated, Article 9(8)(b) of Directive 2004/18 provides, in addition, for a restriction on the period to be taken into account for the purposes of calculating the total price. According to that provision, in the case of such contracts total value is to be calculated by multiplying the monthly value by 48. Such a restriction, limiting the calculation period to four years, is included also in Article 7(5) of Directive 92/50 which may apply also to framework agreements. (73)

150. Even if, according to the procurement directives, in relation to a framework agreement for which a total price is not indicated, the total value to be taken into account must be determined, in principle, thus, on the basis of an ex ante estimate, in the present proceedings the Commission has based its calculations primarily on statistics concerning the participation of local authority employees in the conversion of earnings in 2006. Having regard to the fact that the Federal Republic of Germany has not put forward any real alternative to that ex post method of calculation, it must be presumed that the readiness of public service employees to take advantage of the option for conversion of earnings in 2006 corresponded to the estimates. Accordingly, the participation by public service employees in the conversion of earnings system in 2006 constitutes a legitimate starting point for determining whether or not the framework agreements in question satisfy the threshold.

151. According to consistent case-law, it is for the Commission to prove the allegation that the Treaty obligation has not been fulfilled. Having regard to the observations I made above, in the present infringement proceedings it is incumbent on the Commission, therefore, to prove that on the basis of the information available concerning the conversion of earnings in 2006 it may be presumed that the value of each of the framework agreements in question exceeded the threshold of EUR 249 000.

152. In my opinion, in the present case, the Commission has failed to adduce that proof.

153. In determining which local authority employers have concluded with pension scheme providers framework agreements exceeding the threshold relevant for procurement law purposes the Commission relies on a series of statistical data which it combines with a set of presumptions.

154. In its application, the Commission presumed that every large German city concluded for an unlimited term a framework agreement with a pension scheme provider. Moreover, according to research by TNS Infratest, (74) attached as an annex to the application, it followed that in December 2006 2.3% of employees in the public service sector made use of the facility for the conversion of earnings and that in 2006 the monthly amount converted was approximately EUR 158 per month.

155. The Commission then used that statistical information as the basis on which to calculate, in accordance with Article 9(8) of Directive 2004/18, the value of each insurance contract entered into by a local authority employee within the scope of a framework agreement concluded by his employer as follows: EUR 158 x 48 months = EUR 7 584. According to the Commission, it follows from that calculation that every framework agreement which results in the conclusion of 28 or more individual insurance contracts has a value of EUR 212 352 or greater and, accordingly, exceeds the threshold – considered by the Commission as decisive – of EUR 211 000.

156. In order to determine in which cities no less than 28 local authority employees had applied or were likely to apply for conversion of earnings, the Commission combined the abovementioned rate of participation of local authority employees in the conversion of earnings procedure of 2.3% with a further academic study in this case on the relationship between the population figures for cities and municipalities and the number of local authority workers. (75) The Commission derived from the latter study in particular the fact that in 2000/01 for every 1 000 inhabitants there were 17.8 local authority workers. According to the Commission, from that figure, for 2006, an employee figure of 16 local authority workers for every 1 000 inhabitants can be deduced. From that, in turn, according to its argument, it can be extrapolated for 2006/07 that every German city whose population exceeds 76 125 inhabitants concluded a framework agreement in excess of the threshold – considered by the Commission as decisive – of EUR 211 000.

157. To identify the cities which are alleged, in fact, to have infringed the procurement directives, the Commission produced a list of the largest cities in Germany together with their population figures and, in that regard, showed in its application that the 110 largest cities have populations in excess of 76 125 inhabitants and, consequently, concluded the framework agreements in question in contravention of procurement law.

158. After the Federal Republic of Germany in its defence – setting out detailed information in substantiation – rejected as incorrect the rate of participation of local authority employees in the conversion of earnings procedure of 2.3%, the mean conversion amount of EUR 158 per month, the employment figure of 16 local authority workers for every 1 000 inhabitants, the assumption that local authority employers conclude a framework agreement with only one pension scheme provider and the assumption that every large German city falls within the scope of the TV-EUmw/VKA, the Commission made minor revisions to its calculations.

159. On the basis of a legal opinion of 25 November 2005, (76) in its reply, the Commission now stated the mean amount converted as EUR 106.77 per month and reduced the mean employment figure from 16 to 15 local authority workers for every 1 000 inhabitants. In addition, the Commission removed the city of Berlin from its calculations. However, it adhered to the estimated rate of participation of local authority employees in the conversion of earnings procedure of 2.3% and rejected as inconsequential the argument that individual local authority employers had concluded framework agreements with several pension scheme providers.

160. On the basis of those new parameters, according to the Commission, it can be extrapolated that German cities with a population in 2004/05 in excess of 136 267 inhabitants, in 2006/07 in excess of 121 800 inhabitants and in 2008/09 in excess of 118 867 inhabitants concluded framework agreements which exceeded the threshold applicable for the period concerned.

161. To identify the cities which are alleged, in fact, to have infringed the procurement directives, the Commission again referred to a list of the largest German cities, now excluding Berlin. Consequently, according to that argument, for 2004/05 the smallest city in population terms exceeding the threshold was Darmstadt with a population of 141 257 inhabitants. For 2006/07, it was Ingolstadt with a population of 122 167 inhabitants and for 2008/09 Bottrop with a population of 118 975 inhabitants.

162. In its rejoinder, the German Government in reply to that recalculation again stressed the fact that numerous employers concluded framework agreements with several pension scheme providers. Moreover, it argued that the mean employment figure advanced by the Commission of 15 local authority workers for every 1 000 inhabitants is not meaningful in the present proceedings as that employment figure includes also local authority civil servants who, in fact, fall outside the scope of the TV-EUmw/VKA. Only 85.6% of local authority workers constitute employees who can participate in the conversion of earnings and, as a result, so it argued, the statistically relevant mean employment figure is at the most 12.84 local authority workers for every 1 000 inhabitants. In addition, Germany again contested the estimated rate of participation of local authority employees in the conversion of earnings procedure of 2.3% and the estimated monthly amount converted of EUR 106.77 and submitted on the basis of the latest information that the mean proportion of local authority employees who took part in conversion of earnings in 2006 was 2.04% with a mean monthly contribution to conversion of earnings of EUR 89.92. (77)

163. On the basis of that information included in the rejoinder, following the method of calculation adopted by the Commission, it may be extrapolated that German cities with a population in excess of 217 610 may have concluded framework agreements with an estimated value in excess of EUR 249 000. Consequently, on the basis of a list of the largest German cities it may be concluded – in accordance with the argument pursued by the Commission – that in concluding framework agreements on the conversion of earnings 33 cities (78) may have contravened Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

164. That conclusion presupposes, however, that those 33 cities each concluded only one framework agreement with a pension scheme provider. However, precisely that assumption was contested by the German Government in the pre-litigation procedure and in the subsequent proceedings, too, it remains contested.

165. The resulting uncertainty is of particular significance in the present case. Neither Directive 92/50 nor Directive 2004/18 precludes contracting authorities from splitting their procurement requirements for services. Such splitting may be regarded as contrary to the directives only where this is effected with the intention of avoiding their application. (79) Consequently, what is prohibited is an artificial split of a single contract. Although the Court is decidedly strict in its examination of that prohibition, (80) such intention to circumvent cannot be presumed without more. Each individual case in which a contract was split for the purposes of an award must be examined according to its context and specificities and, in that regard, particular attention must be given to whether there are good reasons pointing in favour of or, on the contrary, against the split in question.

166. In that connection, it is evident from the case-file that in a set of questions of 30 January 2007 addressed to the German Government (81) the Commission itself stated that, as a result of earlier answers given by the Federal Republic of Germany, it deduced that local authority employers concluded public contracts with different groups of insurers. Against that background, in its set of questions the Commission inquired, inter alia, whether between an employer and service provider, generally speaking, framework agreements covering all employees or, instead, individual contracts for each employee were concluded. In addition, it requested information on whether there were employers which had concluded contracts with several different service providers.

167. In its reply of 1 March 2007, the Federal Republic of Germany clarified that there are different approaches to the implementation of conversion of earnings; there are cases in which individual contracts are concluded in respect of each worker and also the conclusion of framework agreements between an employer and one or more provider. In that regard, according to the Federal Republic of Germany, an employer is not obliged by reason of the collective agreement to opt for one of the three implementation methods. It may offer its employees different implementation methods. In practice, according to the Federal Republic of Germany, it is not uncommon for employers to conclude framework contracts with several different providers. (82)

168. Notwithstanding that clear answer that the arrangements for the conversion of earnings by local authority employers can differ considerably, without further questioning, the Commission commenced proceedings. In the framework of the judicial proceedings, it has subsequently remained unresolved whether and, if so, which German cities have concluded framework agreements with several pension scheme providers. Also unresolved has remained the question whether, taking account of the specific circumstances applying to the case of each city and its employees, good substantive reasons pointed in favour of, or, on the contrary, against the conclusion of several framework agreements with different pension scheme providers.

169. In determining whether the Federal Republic of Germany is proven to have infringed the directives, ultimately, in the present proceedings, the decisive issue is which party is responsible for the uncertainty whether, and, if so, the grounds on which, the largest cities in Germany with the exception of Berlin concluded framework agreements with several pension scheme providers. If that uncertainty must be attributed to the defective adduction of evidence on the part of the Commission, it has failed to satisfy the burden of proof imposed on it and the action must be dismissed as insufficiently substantiated. However, if that uncertainty must be attributed to a failure to cooperate by the Federal Republic of Germany in the proper investigation of the facts, the action must be held to be sufficiently substantiated and, consequently, also well founded.

170. Having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, in my view, that uncertainty must be attributed to a defective adduction of evidence on the part of the Commission.

171. In that regard, I wish to stress that by its action the Commission originally sought a declaration that by reason of the fact that the 110 largest German cities have concluded directly with the bodies and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA framework agreements on conversion of earnings, the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. Already in the pre-litigation procedure the Federal Republic of Germany countered that argument by stating that it was common practice for cities and municipalities to conclude framework agreements with several pension scheme providers and that, therefore, it was necessary to differentiate in the calculation whether the thresholds were satisfied. However, the Commission ignored such statement and, without requesting the Federal Republic of Germany to provide further clarification, commenced proceedings.

172. Having regard to the complexity of the present proceedings raising a multiplicity of legal and factual questions, the Federal Republic of Germany cannot be criticised for the fact that neither in the pre-litigation procedure nor in the judicial proceedings has it provided of its own accord a summary of all the framework agreements concluded by Germany's largest cities and explained the background thereto. Having regard to the multiplicity of unresolved legal and factual questions which characterise the present proceedings in which the Commission questioned the award practice of over 100 German cities throughout the Bundesländer, in the pre-litigation procedure the German Government was obliged, first, to highlight in general terms the factual omissions in the Commission's account. In my view, the Commission should have taken those observations of the German Government as grounds for resolving the factual omissions by way of detailed questions. Instead, the Commission commenced proceedings prematurely and, as a result, in the judicial phase the German Government considered itself obliged, first, on a factual level to contradict in substance the statistical data of the Commission. Here, too, I cannot discern any grounds why the Federal Republic of Germany should be blamed for the fact that the Court has not been provided with any explanation whether, and, if so, on what grounds, the cities in question concluded framework agreements with several pension scheme providers.

173. In summary, it must be concluded, therefore, that the Commission has not adduced proof that the estimated value of the framework agreements at issue satisfies the relevant threshold for the application of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. Against that background, the Commission's action must be dismissed as insufficiently substantiated and, thus, unfounded.

3. Interim conclusion

174. In the light of my observations above, I conclude that the Commission has not adduced proof that by reason of the fact that local authorities and local authority undertakings awarded directly to the bodies and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA service contracts concerning occupational old-age pensions the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

C – In the alternative: resolution of a conflict between the procurement directives and the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining

175. If, contrary to the view taken here, the Court concludes that the Commission has adduced proof that one or more local authority or local authority undertaking awarded directly to bodies and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA service contracts concerning occupational old-age pensions in contravention of Directive 92/50 or Directive 2004/18, it must be examined, in addition, whether, in the light of the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining, that incompatibility of the framework agreements concerned vis-à-vis the procurement directives must be regarded as contrary to Community law.

176. In that regard, it must be noted, first, that the preliminary selection made in the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers with which conversion of earnings must be implemented is of a restrictive nature. According to Paragraph 6 of that collective agreement, in principle, conversion of earnings may be implemented only with public bodies offering supplementary pensions, savings banks or local authority insurance companies. As a result of those requirements established by collective agreement, local authorities are restricted in their ultimate choice of a pension scheme provider such that they can no longer freely call for tenders for a framework agreement on the conversion of earnings without also infringing the collective agreement.

177. Thus, a conflict exists between the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining and Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. As those procurement directives give effect to freedom of establishment and to freedom to provide services, that conflict must be resolved first at a primary law level treating the conflict as one between the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining, on the one hand, and freedom of establishment and to provide services, on the other. Subsequently, that resolution achieved at a primary law level must implemented at the level of secondary law through an interpretation of the procurement directives in accordance with primary law.

178. Against that background, in the following section, first, I shall address the question of the criteria and yardsticks according to which a conflict between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights must be resolved. On the basis of those criteria and yardsticks, I shall subsequently demonstrate how a conflict between freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services and the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining may be resolved in the present case. That examination allows finally for a determination whether or not the incompatibility of the framework agreements concerned vis-à-vis Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, taking account of the obligation to interpret those directives in line with primary law, permits a finding that the directives have been infringed.

1. Resolution of conflicts between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights: Viking Line and Laval un Partneri

179. In its recent case-law, the Court tends to resolve conflicts between the exercise of fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms by reference to the ‘written’ grounds included in the EC Treaty and the ‘unwritten’ grounds recognised in case-law justifying a restriction on fundamental freedoms.

180. Exemplary in that regard is the judgment in Viking Line. (83) In those proceedings for a preliminary ruling, the Court was required to rule, inter alia, whether a restriction on freedom of establishment resulting from collective action initiated by trade unions against a private undertaking was permitted. In that regard, the Court held, first, that although the right to take collective action, including the right to strike, must be recognised as a fundamental right, (84) the collective action at issue had to be regarded in formal terms as a restriction on freedom of establishment. (85) Then, the Court turned to the question of justification for that restriction. In so doing, it stressed, first, the ‘unwritten’ justification of ‘overriding reasons in the public interest’, according to which a restriction on freedom of establishment may be accepted if it pursues a legitimate aim compatible with the Treaty and is justified by overriding reasons in the public interest on condition that the restriction also must be suitable for securing the attainment of the objective pursued and must not go beyond what is necessary in order to attain it. (86) Then the Court confirmed that protection of workers counts as one of the overriding reasons in the public interest recognised by the Court, (87) subject to the proviso that, naturally, it was for the national court to ascertain whether the objectives pursued by means of the collective action concerned the protection of workers. (88) If that were the case, the national court would then have to ascertain if the collective action at issue was suitable for ensuring the attainment of the objective pursued and did not go beyond what was necessary to attain that objective. (89)

181. Although in the framework of analysing the justification for restrictions on freedom of establishment the Court referred also to the tasks and objectives of the Community in the social policy sphere, (90) ultimately, it did not examine whether, having regard to the principle of proportionality, the exercise as such of the fundamental social right to take collective action was apt to justify a restriction on freedom of establishment. Instead, it subsumed the fundamental social right to take collective action within the traditional scheme of analysis of the unwritten justification of ‘overriding reasons in the public interest’. (91) In that regard, particular emphasis was placed on the notion – inherent in that fundamental right – of protection of workers which had already been recognised in consistent case-law as an overriding reason in the public interest. (92)

182. A similar scheme of analysis was employed by the Court in Laval un Partneri, (93) in which, first, it recognised the right to take collective action as a fundamental right; in the subsequent analysis of justification for the impairment of the freedom to provide services arising in the scope of the collective action, however, it again made reference to the protection of workers as an overriding reason in the public interest.

2. Equal ranking for fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms and resolution of conflicts on the basis of the principle of proportionality

183. The approach adopted in Viking Line and Laval un Partneri, according to which Community fundamental social rights as such may not justify – having due regard to the principle of proportionality – a restriction on a fundamental freedom but that a written or unwritten ground of justification incorporated within that fundamental right must, in addition, always be found, sits uncomfortably alongside the principle of equal ranking for fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms.

184. Such an analytical approach suggests, in fact, the existence of a hierarchical relationship between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights in which fundamental rights are subordinated to fundamental freedoms (94) and, consequently, may restrict fundamental freedoms only with the assistance of a written or unwritten ground of justification. (95)

185. In that connection, it must be noted also that the unwritten justification of 'overriding reasons in the public interest' may not apply to justify discriminatory restrictions on fundamental freedoms. (96) Consequently, if the exercise of a fundamental Community right results in a discriminatory restriction on a fundamental freedom, under the scheme of analysis adopted in Viking Line and Laval un Partneri, it would have to be examined whether an express justification for restrictions on the fundamental freedom concerned established in the EC Treaty applies. That additional limitation on the possibility to justify a restriction on the fundamental freedoms would accentuate the existence of a hierarchical relationship between fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms.

186. In my view, there is no such hierarchical relationship between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights. (97)

187. In addition, the relationship between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights is characterised by a broad convergence both in terms of structure and content. Thus, it is possible, for example, to formulate the substantive guarantee inherent in fundamental freedoms in terms of fundamental rights, in particular, using fundamental rights which protect economic activity. In the light of that convergence, it would be a mistake to seek to construct a generally conflictual or hierarchical relationship between fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms. (98)

188. Therefore, if in an individual case, as a result of exercising a fundamental right, a fundamental freedom is restricted, a fair balance between both of those legal positions must be sought. (99) In that regard, it must be presumed that the realisation of a fundamental freedom constitutes a legitimate objective which may limit a fundamental right. Conversely, however, the realisation of a fundamental right must be recognised also as a legitimate objective which may restrict a fundamental freedom.

189. For the purposes of drawing an exact boundary between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights, the principle of proportionality is of particular importance. In that context, for the purposes of evaluating proportionality, in particular, a three-stage scheme of analysis must be deployed where (1) the appropriateness, (2) the necessity and (3) the reasonableness of the measure in question must be reviewed. (100)

190. A fair balance between fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms is ensured in the case of a conflict only when the restriction by a fundamental right on a fundamental freedom is not permitted to go beyond what is appropriate, necessary and reasonable to realise that fundamental right. Conversely, however, nor may the restriction on a fundamental right by a fundamental freedom go beyond what is appropriate, necessary and reasonable to realise the fundamental freedom. (101)

191. Having regard to the broad convergence between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights, in the event of a conflict, only this analysis based on the principle of proportionality is capable of producing an outcome which ensures the optimum effectiveness of fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms.

192. In the light of my observations above, I conclude that a restriction on a fundamental freedom must be regarded as justified if that restriction arose in the exercise of a Community fundamental right and was appropriate, necessary and reasonable for the attainment of the interests protected by that fundamental right. Conversely, a restriction on a fundamental right must be regarded also as justified if that restriction arose in the exercise of a fundamental freedom and was appropriate, necessary and reasonable for the attainment of the interests protected by that fundamental freedom.

193. Moreover, confirmation of this approach characterised by an equal ranking of fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms in which the principle of proportionality serves as the basis for the resolution of conflicts between the exercise of fundamental freedoms and the exercise of fundamental rights would not constitute a fundamental reorientation in the case-law. Instead, this analysis implies a return to the values already inherent in Schmidberger. (102) In addition, in Rüffert (103) one can detect the first signs of a need to qualify the approach taken in Viking Line and Laval un Partneri.

194. In Schmidberger, on a reference for a preliminary ruling, the Court had to rule, inter alia, whether a restriction on the free movement of goods resulting from a 30-hour blockade of the Brenner motorway could be justified having regard to the fact that such blockade constituted the legitimate exercise of the fundamental rights to freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. In order to resolve that conflict between the fundamental rights at issue and the free movement of goods, in essence, the Court examined whether the impairments to intra-Community trade arising through the exercise of fundamental rights were proportionate to the protection of those rights. (104) Conversely, it was examined also whether strict enforcement of the free movement of goods would have resulted in an excessive interference in the exercise of the fundamental rights. (105) As both questions were answered in the affirmative, the restriction on the free movement of goods arising through the exercise of the fundamental rights at issue, ultimately, had to be regarded as justified.

195. Accordingly, central to Schmidberger was the idea of equal ranking for conflicting fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms which, ultimately, by an examination of the proportionality of the opposing restrictions in question, were brought fairly into balance.

196. At this point, finally, Rüffert (106) should not go unmentioned, in which on a reference for a preliminary ruling the Court ruled, inter alia, on the compatibility with Article 49 EC of the Niedersächsisches Landesvergabegesetz (Law of Land Niedersachsen on the award of public contracts).

197. In that regard, the Court held, first, that requirements established by that law obliging contracting authorities to designate as contractors for public works contracts only contractors which, when submitting their tenders, agree in writing to pay their employees, in return for performance of the services concerned, at least the wage provided for in the collective agreement in force at the place where those services are performed, even where that collective agreement is not capable of being treated as universally applicable, are capable of constituting a restriction within the meaning of Article 49 EC. In the framework of its examination whether such restriction could be considered to be justified, the Court examined subsequently three ‘unwritten’ grounds of justification. In particular, it was examined whether the restriction could be justified (1) by the objective of ensuring the protection of workers, (2) by the objective of ensuring protection for independence in the organisation of working life by trade unions, or (3) by the objective of ensuring the financial stability of social security systems.

198. Although, ultimately, the Court held the restriction on the freedom to provide services not to be justified, above all, the examination of justification from the perspective of ensuring ‘protection for independence in the organisation of working life by trade unions’ appears to me to be particularly important. Whilst in the concepts of the ‘objective of ensuring protection of workers’ and the ‘objective of ensuring the financial stability of social security systems’ reference was had to two overriding reasons in the public interest recognised in settled case-law, (107) in examining the ‘protection for independence in the organisation of working life by trade unions’ the Court considered, at least, implicitly, the possibility that the fundamental social right to freedom of association, in itself, could justify a restriction on fundamental freedoms.

199. In the light of the foregoing, I conclude that a restriction on a fundamental freedom is justified, when that restriction arose in the exercise of a fundamental right and was appropriate, necessary and reasonable for the attainment of interests protected by that fundamental right. As a mirror image thereof, a restriction on a fundamental right is justified, when that restriction arose in the exercise of a fundamental freedom and was appropriate, necessary and reasonable for the attainment of interests protected by that fundamental freedom.

3. Resolution of the conflict between Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 and the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining

200. If the Court were to conclude that one or more local authority or local authority undertaking awarded directly to bodies and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA service contracts concerning occupational old-age pensions contrary to the provisions of Directive 92/50 or Directive 2004/18, it would be clear that, in formal terms, those procurement directives preclude the manner in which, in fact, the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining were exercised. In that sense, there would be an impairment of those fundamental social rights as a result of the procurement directives because the social partners would no longer be capable of freely exercising those fundamental social rights but would be tied – from a procurement law perspective – to certain requirements.

201. The conflict thus produced between Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 and those fundamental social rights must be resolved, first, in examining at the level of primary law whether freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services allow for such a restriction of those fundamental social rights. If that question must be answered in the affirmative, there is nothing to preclude the finding that the framework agreements in question contravene Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 which give effect to freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services. If, however, that question must be answered in the negative, it would have to be ensured through an interpretation of those directives in conformity with primary law that the framework agreements in question fall outside the scope of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

202. For the purposes of ascertaining whether freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services allow for such restriction on the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining as is provided for in the procurement directives, in principle, it must be examined whether in order to attain the objectives pursued by the fundamental freedoms such a restriction is appropriate, necessary and reasonable.

203. However, in the present proceedings, the German Government advanced, above all, arguments seeking to justify a restriction on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services by fundamental social rights.

204. The assessment of whether freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services may justify a restriction on the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining constitutes, ultimately, the mirror image of the assessment of whether those fundamental social rights may justify a restriction on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services. As the latter option for analysis facilitates a thorough evaluation of the arguments advanced by the German Government, in the following section I will examine whether for the attainment of the objectives pursued by the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining it was necessary to restrict fundamental freedoms in the manner contested by the Commission.

205. By their nature, the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining are intended to ensure that employers or employers' organisations, on the one hand, and workers' organisations, on the other, in the framework of voluntary negotiations and in complete independence, respecting certain limits and requirements, may negotiate and subsequently record in an appropriate form workers' terms and conditions of employment. (108)

206. Thus, having regard to the principle of proportionality, the restriction on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services arising as a result of the preliminary selection in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers would have to be considered justified by the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining, if that preliminary selection of pension scheme providers was appropriate and necessary to permit voluntary and independent negotiations on terms and conditions of employment with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement and the infringement of fundamental freedoms thereby occasioned was proportionate to the attainment of those objectives.

207. A measure is appropriate to ensuring the attainment of the objective in question if it genuinely reflects a concern to attain it in a consistent and systematic manner. (109)

208. Having regard to the fact that the principle of concentrating the conversion of earnings to a limited number of pension scheme providers was incorporated in the TV-EUmw/VKA, it must be presumed that such principle constitutes part of a compromise reached in the framework of voluntary and independent negotiations between the representatives of employers and those of workers. At any rate, the case-file does not include any information to permit an alternative conclusion. Against that background, the preliminary selection in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers must be considered a measure which is appropriate to ensure the attainment of the interests protected by the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining.

209. A measure is necessary if, from among several measures which are appropriate for meeting the objective pursued, it is the least onerous for the interest or legal right in question. (110)

210. Having regard to the peculiarities of the present case, evaluation of the necessity of the preliminary selection in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers logically presupposes the verification of whether, in the framework of collective bargaining, an alternative consensus on the implementation of conversion of earnings could conceivably have been achieved. Only if the social partners could have achieved an alternative consensus, conforming more closely to Community law, could the preliminary selection at issue in favour of certain pension scheme providers be rejected as unnecessary.

211. In answering the question whether in the framework of voluntary and independent negotiations the social partners could have achieved an alternative consensus on the implementation of conversion of earnings, the Court must proceed with great caution. Although for the purposes of resolving a conflict between fundamental freedoms and the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining an examination of the substance of collective agreements may – as in the present case – also be required, in that regard, the Court must respect as far as possible the social partners' scope for assessment and action. (111)

212. Thus, in the present case, the assessment of necessity must be limited to evaluating whether an implementation measure, conforming more closely to Community law, could have been achieved and if the social partners could have achieved such evident consensus on that measure that no substantive arguments would have countered its adoption. Should those questions be answered in the affirmative, the preliminary selection in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers would have to be rejected as unnecessary and, thus, disproportionate.

213. In my view, it would have been possible without more to have structured the agreements on the implementation of conversion of earnings in conformity with Community law.

214. In that connection, it must be stressed that the action brought by the Commission does not contest the principle of conversion of earnings in itself but simply the fact that the collective agreement imposes on local authority employers a selection of pension scheme providers for the purposes of implementing the conversion of earnings notwithstanding the fact – assuming that the procurement directives apply – that such employers in their capacity as contracting authorities are required, in accordance with those directives, to launch an invitation to tender.

215. In those circumstances, it is possible to conceive of an alternative scheme compliant with Community law in which, within the framework of the implementation methods provided for the BetrAVG, conversion of earnings would have to be implemented through one or more pension scheme providers selected by local authority employers in accordance with the primary law obligation of transparency (112) or, where the conditions for their application are satisfied, with the procurement law directives.

216. The question whether in the present proceedings substantive arguments have been advanced to counter such a provision of a collective agreement on the implementation of conversion of earnings in conformity with Community law must, in my view, be answered in the negative.

217. For the purposes of justifying the preliminary selection in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers, the German Government stresses that under the BetrAVG it is, in principle, for the employer to select the pension scheme provider to implement the conversion of earnings not based on a collective agreement. By way of derogation, in relation to earnings based on a collective agreement, Paragraph 17(5) of the BetrAVG provides that conversion of such necessitates a collectively agreed scheme, thereby ensuring, in the view of the German Government, in particular, that workers are granted a greater influence over the arrangements for their occupational old-age pensions. In that regard, Paragraph 17(3) of the BetrAVG grants to the social partners the possibility, inter alia, to determine by mutual agreement the selection of the pension scheme provider for the purposes of implementing the conversion of earnings based on a collective agreement, as has been effected, in fact, in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA. That preliminary selection, reached by common accord, in favour of certain pension scheme providers serves, in the view of the German Government, both the interests of workers in the establishment of a transparent scheme for the implementation of conversion of earnings and the interests of employers in an old-age pension scheme which requires little administrative effort. Ultimately, so they argue, shifting that decision into the realm of the social partners thereby contributes to ensuring the broadest possible acceptance and take-up of that form of occupational old-age pension.

218. In addition, the German Government argues that, according to the view of the social partners, limiting the pool from which an employer may select providers for the conversion of earnings is intended to improve the transparency and popularity of supplementary occupational old-age pensions. Moreover, Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA simplifies matters for an individual employer as a comparison between pension scheme providers is no longer necessarily required. In addition, argues the German Government, an individual local authority employer may presume that the social partners' selection of pension scheme providers was not arbitrary and that, as a rule, the social partners had a better overview of the market situation. Conversely, workers could rely on the fact that in the selection of pension scheme providers the trade unions adequately represented their interests. Accordingly, so the German Government argues, Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA protects workers against an 'unsatisfactory' and unilateral selection by the employer of the pension scheme provider.

219. As specific justification for the selection made in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of public bodies offering supplementary pensions, the Sparkassen finance group and local authority insurance companies, the German Government argues, in addition, that these were nominated for good reasons such as, for example, positive experience, particular confidence and reduced administrative costs resulting from the particular structure of those pension scheme providers. In addition, the employers' interest in limiting the risk of their liability for default also influenced that decision.

220. In the light of those observations, the substantive arguments advanced by the German Government in justification of the scheme provided for in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA may be summarised in four categories, that is (1) transparency in the selection of pension scheme providers, (2) greater acceptance amongst workers as a result of the participation of worker representatives in the preliminary selection in favour of certain pension scheme providers, (3) the greater expertise of the parties involved in negotiating the collective agreement and (4) particular characteristics of the chosen pension scheme providers.

221. Those arguments are, however, wholly unsuited to be invoked as substantive grounds with which to counter the adoption by collective agreement of an implementation scheme in conformity with Community law in which individual local authority employers must select pension scheme providers in accordance with the primary law requirement of transparency or, where the conditions for their application are satisfied, with the procurement law directives.

222. The argument concerning the transparency of the choice of the pension scheme providers does not point against but in favour of an obligation on local authority employers to respect Community law requirements. The primary law obligation of transparency and the procurement directives are intended precisely to ensure sufficient transparency in the selection of the pension scheme providers with which conversion of earnings must be effected.

223. Nor does the argument of greater interest amongst workers resulting from the participation of worker representatives in the preliminary selection in favour of certain pension scheme providers imply a substantive reason opposing an implementation scheme in conformity with Community law. In fact, the obligation to respect the primary law obligation of transparency and the procurement law directives would trigger more intensive Community-scale competition between pension scheme providers and, hence, would constitute a particular guarantee that, ultimately, the most advantageous scheme for the implementation of conversion of earnings would be offered to workers. It is not apparent how this could result in a reduced level of interest amongst workers. (113)

224. The third main argument of the German Government concerns local authority employers for which the preliminary selection in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA simplifies the ultimate decision in favour of one or more pension scheme provider and, in that regard, allows those employers to rely also on the expertise of the social partners.

225. Even if, as a result of the preliminary selection established in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA, local authority employers are spared, in fact, the task of launching a separate invitation to tender, that does not constitute a reliable argument with which to counter an obligation to respect the primary law obligation of transparency and the procurement directives. Even if, as a result of the obligation to respect Community law, employers were less interested in the determination of a collectively agreed scheme for the implementation of conversion of earnings – an argument not advanced by the German Government – that could not be invoked as substantive grounds on which to oppose the determination of such obligation by way of collective agreement. Such an argument, in fact, would result in the situation that local authority employers could exploit the right to autonomy in collective bargaining in order to circumvent mandatory requirements of Community law.

226. By its fourth main argument, the German Government refers finally to special features of the selected pension scheme providers. In its view, factors in favour of the selection of those pension scheme providers are, in particular, the positive experiences had with those bodies, the particular confidence thereby resulting, low administrative costs deriving from their particular structure and the reduced risk of default. However, the German Government has in no way substantiated those arguments such that for that reason alone they must be rejected as unfounded. (114)

227. In the light of those observations, I conclude that the restriction on pension scheme providers established in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA was unnecessary to facilitate voluntary and independent negotiations between the social partners on terms and conditions of employment with a view to the conclusion of a collective agreement.

228. In addition, the preliminary selection adopted by the social partners in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers results, in my view, in an unreasonable restriction on fundamental freedoms.

229. In the context of the assessment of reasonableness in the present case, it must be observed in particular that the action brought by the Commission does not contest the principle of conversion of earnings in itself but simply the fact that for local authority employers collective agreement prescribes their choice of pension scheme provider for the implementation of conversion of earnings notwithstanding the fact that such employers, in their capacity as contracting authorities, must respect the requirements resulting from the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

230. Consequently, the present proceedings do not concern the fundamental decision taken by collective agreement to allow for conversion of earnings but the seemingly technical question – from the point of view of the law on collective agreements – of how to select the pension scheme providers with which conversion of earnings must be implemented. However, in adopting the preliminary selection of Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in regulation of that seemingly technical question, the social partners have attempted to exclude in their entirety the requirements resulting from the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

231. Having regard to the fact that the requirements included in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA must be regarded as technical implementing provisions hardly touching on terms and conditions of employment whilst at the same time their effect is to exclude in their entirety the requirements resulting from the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, the restriction on the fundamental freedoms resulting from Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA must be categorised as unreasonable. (115)

232. Thus, in the light of the foregoing, it must be concluded that the preliminary selection of pension scheme providers in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA was neither necessary nor reasonable for ensuring the attainment of the objectives protected by the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining.

233. In the light of those considerations, I conclude that the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining are incapable of justifying the restriction on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services resulting from the preliminary selection adopted by the social partners in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA in favour of certain pension scheme providers because such restriction is not proportionate. Consequently, nor do those fundamental rights preclude the finding that the framework agreements in question concluded in implementation of that collective agreement may infringe Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

4. Interim conclusion

234. If, contrary to the view I have taken, the Court concludes that in concluding framework agreements on the conversion of earnings with one or more of the bodies and undertakings mentioned in Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA one or more local authority or local authority undertaking contravened Directive 92/50 or Directive 2004/18, it would have to be presumed, having regard to the above analysis, that, owing to an absence of proportionality, the fundamental rights to bargain collectively and to autonomy in collective bargaining do not preclude a finding of such an infringement of those directives.

VIII – Summary

235. In summary, I conclude that in concluding the framework agreements in question on occupational pension provision for their employees German local authorities were obliged to respect the provisions of Directive 92/50 or Directive 2004/18 to the extent that the material and personal requirements of those directives were satisfied. However, it is incumbent on the Commission to prove that the scope of the procurement directives was triggered and, in doing so, it may not rely on presumptions.

236. For the purposes of reaching a decision in the present proceedings, ultimately, the crucial fact is that in its calculations on the value of each individual framework agreement and on meeting the relevant thresholds for the application of the procurement directives the Commission relied on the presumption that each city of a certain size concluded only one framework agreement. As already in the pre-litigation procedure the German Government contested the correctness of that presumption and, in that connection, it cannot be alleged in any way that it failed to cooperate in the proper investigation of the facts, ultimately, the Commission's action must be dismissed as insufficiently substantiated and, thus, unfounded.

IX – Conclusion

237. In the light of the foregoing conclusions, I propose that the Court should:

(1) dismiss the action;

(2) order the Commission to pay the costs, with the exception of the costs incurred by the Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden. The Kingdom of Denmark and the Kingdom of Sweden shall pay their own costs.

14 – See Joined Cases C-180/98 to C-184/98 Pavlov and Others [2000] ECR I-6451, paragraph 67 et seq., in which the Court emphasised that the exclusion of collective agreements from the scope of Article 81(1) EC cannot be extended to an agreement which, whilst being intended to guarantee a certain level of pension to all the members of a profession and thus to improve one aspect of their working conditions, namely their remuneration, is not concluded in the context of collective bargaining between employers and workers.

15 – Expressly confirmed in Van der Woude, cited above in footnote 6, paragraph 22 et seq.

16 – In the same vein, see Aicher, J. and Schumacher, F., in Grabitz, E. and Hilf, M., Das Recht der Europäischen Union, Volume II, Article 81 EC, point 28 (40th update: October 2009).

17 – Cited above in footnote6.

18 – This substantive control of collective agreements was proposed by Advocate General Jacobs in his Joined Opinion in Case C-67/96 Albany, Joined Cases C-115/97 to C-117/97 Brentjens' and Case C-219/97 Drijvende Bokken [1999] ECR I-5751, point 190 et seq., to avoid collective negotiations being used as a framework for agreements between employers with seriously anti-competitive effects on third parties or third markets. According to Advocate General Jacobs, the outcome of collective negotiations should be regarded as falling outside the scope of competition rules only if (1) the agreement was made in the formal framework of collective bargaining and (2) was concluded by the social partners in good faith. In addition, as a third criterion, Advocate General Jacobs proposed that collective agreements must deal with the core subjects of collective bargaining such as wages and working conditions and not directly affect third parties or markets.

19 – In that connection, it should be especially observed that the virtual absence of any substantive examination of the provisions of the collective agreements concerned has to be viewed in the context of the Court's subsequent assessment of whether the pension funds mentioned by the social partners constituted undertakings for the purposes of Article 81 EC. Given the Court's ultimate finding in Albany, Brentjens' and Drijvende Bokken that those funds displayed the characteristics of undertakings, that allowed for a separate assessment of the anti-competitive effects resulting from the funds concerned. In so doing, ultimately, this qualified the limitation on the scope of competition law in relation to the collective agreements in question.

24 – See on that point also Novitz, T., 'Taking collective action', Competition Law Insight 2008, Volume 7(4), p. 10, who takes the view that non-application of the 'Albany exclusion' in Viking Line, cited above in footnote 22, can be explained precisely by the Court's decision to recognise the right to take collective action as a fundamental social right. In the view of Azoulai, L., 'The Court of Justice and the social market economy: the emergence of an ideal and the conditions for its realisation', CMLR 2008, p. 1335, at p. 1347 et seq., there is, in fact, a fundamental difference between the relationship between fundamental freedoms and fundamental rights as expressed in Albany and that same relationship as expressed in Viking Line.

28 – Article 6 of the European Social Charter, adopted verbatim in Article 6 of the revised European Social Charter signed in Strasbourg on 3 May 1996, with a view to ensuring the effective exercise of the right to bargain collectively obliges the signatory parties, inter alia, to promote joint consultation between workers and employers and to promote, where necessary and appropriate, machinery for voluntary negotiations between employers or employers' organisations and workers' organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements.

---

29 – According to point 12 of the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers, employers or employers' organisations, on the one hand, and workers' organisations, on the other, shall have the right to negotiate and conclude collective agreements under the conditions laid down by national legislation and practice.

---

30 – According to Article 28 of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, workers and employers, or their respective organisations, have, in accordance with Community law and national laws and practices, the right to negotiate and conclude collective agreements at the appropriate levels and, in cases of conflicts of interest, to take collective action to defend their interests, including strike action.

---

31 – On that point, see, for example, Case C-341/05 Laval un Partneri [2007] ECR I-11767, paragraphs 90 and 91, and Viking Line, cited above in footnote 22, paragraphs 43 and 44, in which having regard to its recognition in the European Social Charter, Convention No 87 of the International Labour Organisation concerning Freedom of Association and the Right to Organise, the Community Charter of the Fundamental Social Rights of Workers and the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, the right to take collective action, closely connected to the right to bargain collectively, was recognised as a fundamental right.

32 – On that point, see, for example, Schwarze, J., 'Der Reformvertrag von Lissabon – Wesentliche Elemente des Reformvertrags', EuR 2009 (Supplement No 1), p. 9, at p. 17, who points out, in my view, correctly, that the fact that Article 6 TEU includes simply a general reference to the charter is not relevant in legal terms and cannot be used as an argument to contest the incorporation of the Charter of Fundamental Rights in primary law. However, Protocol No 30 on the Application of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union to Poland and the United Kingdom provides for a derogation for Poland and the United Kingdom.

33 – It is now settled case-law of the Court that protection of fundamental rights constitutes a legitimate interest which, in principle, justifies a restriction of the obligations imposed by a fundamental freedom guaranteed in primary law; see Laval un Partneri, cited above in footnote 31, paragraph 93; Viking Line, cited above in footnote 22, paragraph 45; Omega, cited above in footnote 27, paragraph 35; and Schmidberger, cited above in footnote 27, paragraph 74. However, that does not imply that acts which must be regarded as the exercise of a fundamental right, eo ipso, fall outside the scope of the fundamental freedoms. Instead, fundamental rights must be exercised, as far as possible, in accordance with the rights and freedoms protected by the Treaty, and, in that regard, every conflict between fundamental rights and obligations resulting from the fundamental freedoms must be resolved having regard to the specific features of the fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms concerned in accordance with the principle of proportionality. See point 183 et seq. of this Opinion.

42 – On the other hand, if a contracting authority seeks in a capacity as a provider of services itself to exercise an independent economic activity subject to competition and in that connection enters into competition with private economic actors, the possibility cannot be precluded that its decision to subcontract a part of the activities to a particular third party is guided by considerations other than economic ones. Consequently, in such a case the procurement directives apply without limitation. See Case C-126/03 Commission v Germany [2004] ECR I-11197, paragraph 16 et seq.

50 – Article 1(5) of Directive 2004/18 paraphrases a framework agreement as ‘an agreement between one or more contracting authorities and one or more economic operators, the purpose of which is to establish the terms governing contracts to be awarded during a given period, in particular with regard to price and, where appropriate, the quantity envisaged’. Although that general formulation does not state directly that those framework agreements usually contain the terms for future contracts awarded by the contracting authority, it clearly follows from recital 11 in the preamble that the legislature started from that premiss.

58 – To the same effect, see also Schmidt, J., ‘Betriebliche Altersvorsorge im öffentlichen Dienst durch private Versicherungsunternehmen’, VersR. 2007, p. 760, at p. 765, who argues, in my view, correctly, that in the case of conversion of earnings a teleological interpretation of the procurement directives points in favour of the application of procurement law. In addition, that author discusses the possibility to treat the fact that the employer introduces its employees to a pension scheme provider as supplying a pecuniary interest.

65 – From a survey of 18 November 2008 by the Arbeitsgemeinschaft Kommunale und Kirchliche Altersversorgung (AKA) e.V. of local authority providers of supplementary pensions concerning the conversion of earnings, the results of which are attached as Annex 2 to the rejoinder of the German Government, it follows that the average proportion of local authority workers who in 2003 had already exercised the option to convert earnings was 0.61%, each contributing by way of earnings conversion an average of EUR 61.28 monthly. That presupposes, naturally, that in 2003 local authority employers had concluded framework agreements with pension scheme providers.

See Vigneau, C., 'Encadrement par la Cour de l'action collective au regard du Traité de Rome', La Semaine Juridique – éd. gén 2008, II 10060, p. 33, at pp. 34 and 35, who argues that in those judgments the Court of Justice recognised the right to take collective action as a 'secondary fundamental right'. Zwanziger, B, 'Arbeitskampf- und Tarifrecht nach den EuGH-Entscheidungen "Laval" und "Viking"', DB 2008, p. 294, at p. 295, argues that in comparison with the approach to reconciling fundamental rights and fundamental freedoms adopted in Schmidberger, cited above in footnote 27, in Viking Line and Laval un Partneri a shift of emphasis in favour of fundamental freedoms was effected.

95 – In that connection, academic writings stress, in addition, that in accordance with consistent case-law of the Court – which holds that Articles 39 EC, 43 EC and 49 EC extend also to rules of any other nature aimed at regulating in a collective manner gainful employment, self-employment and the provision of services (see on that issue point 66 of this Opinion) – under certain conditions, trade unions and other non-governmental associations and bodies may be alleged also to have infringed fundamental freedoms, but that the case-law concerning written and unwritten grounds of justification was developed primarily in connection with Member State infringements of fundamental freedoms. As a result, so the argument goes, for such non-governmental associations it is generally difficult to adduce proof of justification; see Davies, A.C.L., cited above in footnote 91, p. 142. This could be regarded as an asymmetrical development of Community law.

101 – That assessment accords with the principles incorporated in Article 52(1) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union. According to Article 52(1) of the Charter of Fundamental Rights, any limitation on the exercise of the rights and freedoms recognised by that charter must be provided for by law and respect the essence of those rights and freedoms. Subject to the principle of proportionality, limitations may be made only if they are necessary and genuinely meet objectives of general interest recognised by the Union or the need to protect the rights and freedoms of others.

Such substantive control of collective agreements is expressly provided for in Article 7(4) of that regulation. ---

112 – According to consistent case-law, the primary law obligation of transparency requires a sufficient degree of advertising to be ensured for the benefit of any potential contractor. However, it does not necessarily imply an obligation to launch an invitation to tender; see Case C-324/07 Coditel Brabant [2008] ECR I-8457, paragraph 25, and Case C-231/03 Coname [2005] ECR I-7287, paragraph 21.

113 – See also Hanau, P., 'Tarifvertragliche Beschränkungen der Entgeltumwandlung', DB 2004, p. 2266, at p. 2268, who, drawing attention to one of the general principles of German law on collective agreements, that is, the principle that derogations which are more favourable to workers are permitted (Günstigkeitsprinzip), in a particularly pertinent manner, questions the restriction on pension scheme providers established by Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA. In his view, it would be quite simply absurd to presuppose that a collective agreement might preclude local authority employers from concluding agreements on conversion of earnings more favourable to workers and, in particular, regardless of whether such alternative scheme is more favourable in terms of the direct contributions made by the employer or in terms of the benefits offered by the pension scheme provider. As he points out, the purpose of collective agreements is worker protection.

114 – In that connection, it must be noted that leading academic commentators are highly critical of the preliminary selection of pension scheme providers established by Paragraph 6 of the TV-EUmw/VKA. See, in particular, Hanau, P., cited above in footnote 113, p. 2269, who takes the view that the restrictions in the TV-EUmw/VKA on the pension scheme providers authorised to implement conversion schemes appear to favour only the interests of pension scheme providers and not those of workers.

---

115 – On that point, see Jarass, D., EU-Grundrechte, Munich, 2005, p. 344, who takes the view that restrictions on the rights to bargain collectively and to take collective action are possible in particular in those areas in which collective bargaining does not concern terms and conditions of employment.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Third Chamber)

10 September 2009 (*)

(Procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and postal services sectors – Public service for the distribution of drinking water and the treatment of sewage – Service concession – Definition – Transfer to the supplier of the risk connected with operating the service in question)

In Case C-206/08,

REFERENCE for a preliminary ruling under Article 234 EC from the Thüringer Oberlandesgericht (Germany), made by decision of 8 May 2008, received at the Court on 19 May 2008, in the proceedings

having decided, after hearing the Advocate General, to proceed to judgment without an Opinion,

gives the following

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of the term ‘service concession’ within the meaning of Directive 2004/17/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and postal services sectors (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 1).

2 The reference was made in the course of proceedings between Wasser- und Abwasserzweckverband Gotha und Landeskreisgemeinden (Association for the distribution of water and the disposal of sewage in Gotha and the municipalities within its administrative district; ‘WAZV Gotha’) and Eurawasser Aufbereitungs- und Entsorgungsgesellschaft mbH (Water treatment and disposal company; ‘Eurawasser’) concerning the procurement procedure in respect of the public service for the distribution of drinking water and the disposal of sewage.

Legal context

3 Article 1(2)(a) and (d) of Directive 2004/17 provides:

‘2. (a) “Supply, works and service contracts” are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more of the contracting entities referred to in Article 2(2), and one or more contractors, suppliers, or service providers.

(d) “Service contracts” are contracts other than works or supply contracts having as their object the provision of services referred to in Annex XVII.

…’

4 Article 1(3)(b) of that directive states:

‘A “service concession” is a contract of the same type as a service contract except for the fact that the consideration for the provision of services consists either solely in the right to exploit the service or in that right together with payment.’

5 Article 2 of that directive states:

‘1. For the purposes of this Directive:

(a) “Contracting authorities” are State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or several such authorities or one or several of such bodies governed by public law.

2. This Directive shall apply to contracting entities:

(a) which are contracting authorities or public undertakings and which pursue one of the activities referred to in Articles 3 to 7;

6 Article 4 of Directive 2004/17 provides:

‘1. This Directive shall apply to the following activities:

(a) the provision or operation of fixed networks intended to provide a service to the public in connection with the production, transport or distribution of drinking water; or

(b) the supply of drinking water to such networks.

2. This Directive shall also apply to contracts or design contests awarded or organised by entities which pursue an activity referred to in paragraph 1 and which:

(b) are connected with the disposal or treatment of sewage.'

…'

7 Article 18 of that directive provides:

'This Directive shall not apply to works and service concessions which are awarded by contracting entities carrying out one or more of the activities referred to in Articles 3 to 7, where those concessions are awarded for carrying out those activities.'

8 Article 31 of that directive states:

'Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex XVII A shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 34 to 59.'

9 Article 32 of that directive states:

'Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex XVII B shall be governed solely by Articles 34 and 43.'

10 Under Article 71 of Directive 2004/17, the Member States were to bring into force the measures necessary to comply with that directive by 31 January 2006 at the latest.

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

11 It is apparent from the case file that WAZV Gotha is an association of municipalities which is responsible, pursuant to specific provisions of German law, for ensuring the distribution of drinking water and the disposal of sewage for the population resident on its territory.

12 Under a business management contract concluded in 1994, WAZV Gotha entrusted to Stadtwirtschaft Gotha GmbH (municipal undertaking from the town of Gotha; 'Stadtwirtschaft') all the technical, business and administrative services in the water distribution sector. Given that that contract was due to expire in 2008, WAZV Gotha intended to allow Stadtwirtschaft to join it, as a member, so that it could continue to grant it the management contract. However, the supervising authorities, relying on public procurement provisions, refused to authorise Stadtwirtschaft's admission to WAZV Gotha.

13 In order to continue having its business managed by third parties, WAZV Gotha decided to grant a concession in respect of the service for the distribution of drinking water and the disposal of sewage. To that end, it launched, in September 2007, an informal bidding procedure, rather than the formal public procurement procedure referred to in Paragraph 97 et seq. of the Law against Restrictions on Competition (Gesetz gegen Wettbewerbsbeschränkungen; 'the GWB'). WAZV Gotha nevertheless published a notice in the Official Journal of the European Union on 19 September 2007, under reference 2007/S 180-220518.

14 The tender notice announced that a service concession was to be awarded for the distribution of water and the disposal of sewage on the territory covered by WAZV Gotha for a period of 20 years, and invited interested undertakings to apply.

15 The tender notice and the related draft contracts provided that the concession holder would supply the services referred to, on the basis of private law contracts concluded in its own name and on its own account, to users resident in the territory covered by WAZV Gotha, and that it would receive, in consideration, payment from those users.

16 It was provided that the concession holder was competent to calculate at its own discretion, and on an equitable basis, the payment due for the services supplied, and to set that amount on its own responsibility. That competence was, however, limited in so far as the concession holder had, up until 31 December 2009, to apply the rates in force at the time of the publication of the tender notice and, thereafter, the rates had to comply with the provisions of the Law of Thuringia on municipal taxes (Thüringer Kommunlabgabengesetz).

17 The tender notice and the draft contracts provided also that the technical installations for water distribution and disposal of sewage were to remain the property of WAZV Gotha, and that those installations were to be leased by the concession holder, who was to be entitled to include the corresponding rent in the payment sought from users in consideration for the services supplied. The maintenance of those installations was to be the responsibility of the concession holder.

18 WAZV Gotha undertook to make compulsory, by regulation, connection to the public networks of water distribution and disposal of sewage and use of those networks. The concession holder could not, however, require that obligation to be respected in each individual case.

19 Lastly, WAZV Gotha undertook, as far as legally possible, to forward the amount of public subsidies received by it to the concession holder.

20 The closing date for receipt of requests to participate in the procedure was given in the tender notice as 8 October 2007. By letter of 4 October 2007, Eurawasser objected to WAZV Gotha's intention to award the abovementioned services not by a formal tender procedure for the award of a service contract, but by way of a service concession.

21 Eurawasser submitted its request to participate on 8 October 2007. Stadtwirtschaft and Wasserverband Lausitz Betriebsführungs GmbH (management company answerable to the intra-community association for water in the Lausitz region; 'WAL') also participated in the competitive bidding procedure and were invited by WAZV Gotha to submit a bid. In total, at the end of the period laid down in the tender notice, eight requests to participate had been submitted.

22 WAVZ Gotha rejected Eurawasser's complaint by letter of 9 October 2007. After making further complaints, unsuccessfully, on 19 October and 23 November 2007, Eurawasser brought an action before the appropriate Vergabekammer (Public Procurement Board) on the ground that WAZV Gotha had not chosen the appropriate award procedure.

23 By decision of 24 January 2008, the Vergabekammer held that the operation in fact amounted to a service contract, that WAZV Gotha ought to have initiated a formal tender procedure and that the procedure should be re-established from the stage prior to the publication of the tender notice.

24 WAZV Gotha appealed against that decision to the Thüringer Oberlandesgericht (Higher Regional Court of Thuringia).

25 Stadtwirtschaft and WAL were granted leave to intervene in that appeal.

26 It was in those circumstances that the Thüringer Oberlandesgericht decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Is a contract for the supply of services (here, the supply of water and treatment of waste water), the content of which does not provide for the contracting authority to make a direct payment of consideration to the supplier but for the supplier to be afforded the right to collect payment under private law from third parties, to be classified for that reason alone as a "service concession" within the meaning of Article 1(3)(b) of Directive [2004/17] as distinct from a service contract for pecuniary interest within the meaning of Article 1(2)(a) and (d) of the Directive?

2. If the first question is answered in the negative, does a contract of the kind described in the first question constitute a service concession if the risk connected with operating the service in question, because of the rules of public law governing it (compulsory connection and usage; prices calculated on a break-even basis), is significantly limited from the outset – that is to say, even if the contracting authority were to provide the service itself – but the supplier assumes that limited risk in full or at least to a predominant extent?

3. If the second question is also answered in the negative, is Article 1(3)(b) of Directive [2004/17] to be interpreted as meaning that the degree of risk connected with operating the service, particularly the marketing risk, must in qualitative terms be comparable to that which normally exists under conditions in a free market with more than one competing tenderer?'

Admissibility

27 WAZV Gotha argues that the reference for a preliminary ruling is inadmissible on the ground that the reply to the first question is clearly apparent from the definition of a service concession in Article 1(3)(b) of Directive 2004/17 and from the case-law of the Court. Therefore, the interpretation requested is unnecessary. WAL submits arguments which are, in essence, similar.

28 Stadtwirtschaft maintains that the questions referred for a preliminary ruling are not relevant for the purposes of the judgment which the referring court must deliver, given that the dispute in the main proceedings can be decided upon without an answer to those questions. WAZV Gotha organised a proper award procedure, even if it transpires that the contracts at issue in the main proceedings must be categorised as service contracts within the scope of Directive 2004/17.

29 On the other hand, the Commission of the European Communities submits that the reference for a preliminary ruling is admissible. As is apparent from the order for reference, the national court takes the view that the questions referred, concerning the difference between the concepts of service contract and service concession, need to be answered to enable it to decide on the admissibility of the appeal before it.

30 Following the lodging of the order for reference, WAZV Gotha decided, on 4 September 2008, to cancel the bidding procedure which is the subject matter of the dispute in the main proceedings.

31 Following that cancellation, Eurawasser amended its application but did not withdraw it. Eurawasser now seeks a decision declaring that, in the cancelled procedure, its rights were infringed in respect of the rules of public procurement laid down in Paragraph 97 et seq. of the GWB.

32 By letter of 24 December 2008, the referring court informed the Court that it wished to continue with its request for a preliminary ruling. It took the view that, for it to be able to give judgment on the action as amended, it remained necessary to receive a reply to the questions referred, if only because service concessions are from the outset outside the scope of Paragraph 97 et seq. of the GWB and, consequently, the amendment of the action in the main proceedings does not affect the fact that proceedings before bodies with jurisdiction to review procurement procedures, that is to say, the Vergabekammer and the Vergabesenat, would be inadmissible in the event that the contract at issue in the main proceedings were categorised as a service concession.

33 In that regard, the Court has held that, in the context of the cooperation between the Court and the national courts established by Article 234 EC, it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of the case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the Court. Consequently, where the questions submitted concern the interpretation of Community law, the Court is in principle bound to give a ruling (see, inter alia, Case C-544/07 Rüffler [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 36, and the case law cited).

34 The Court has also held that, in exceptional circumstances, it can examine the conditions in which the case was referred to it by the national court, in order to confirm its own jurisdiction. The Court may refuse to rule on a question referred for a preliminary ruling by a national court only where it is quite obvious that the interpretation of Community law that is sought bears no relation to the actual facts of the main action or its purpose, where the problem is hypothetical, or where the Court does not have before it the factual or legal material necessary to give a useful answer to the questions submitted to it (see, inter alia, Rüffler, paragraphs 37 and 38, and the case law cited).

35 In its order for reference, and in its letter of 24 December 2008, the referring court explained clearly the reasons why it considered the questions it has referred to be relevant, and why it considered a reply to those questions to be necessary to decide the dispute before it. In the light of those explanations, the questions referred appear neither hypothetical nor to have no relation with the subject matter of the dispute in the main proceedings.

36 Therefore, the questions referred for a preliminary ruling are admissible.

The questions referred for a preliminary ruling

Preliminary observations

37 As a preliminary point, it should be stated that, according to the information in the case file, WAZV Gotha falls within the definition of contracting authority in Article 2(1)(a) of Directive 2004/17; that contracting authority is one of the types of contracting entities to which that directive applies pursuant to Article 2(2)(a) thereof.

38 The case in the main proceedings, in addition, falls within Directive 2004/17 under Article 4 thereof, inasmuch as the contracting authority concerned, namely WAZV Gotha, is pursuing an activity in the sector of distribution of drinking water and disposal of sewage.

39 The dispute in the main proceedings falls within the temporal scope of Directive 2004/17, since the period laid down in Article 71 of that directive for its implementation expired on 31 January 2006, and the bidding procedure at issue in the main proceedings was launched in September 2007.

40 It should be borne in mind that a definition of service concession was introduced into Community legislation by Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/17. It did not appear in the earlier directives in that area, in particular, Council Directive 93/38/EEC of 14 June 1993 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 84).

41 In Article 18 of Directive 2004/17, the Community legislature states that the directive does not apply to service concessions which are awarded by contracting authorities carrying out activities, inter alia, in the water sector.

42 In addition, it should be recalled that, in relation to its own sphere of application, Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114), includes, in Article 1(2)(a) and (4) thereof, definitions of ‘public contracts’ and of ‘service concession’ which are substantially the same as the corresponding definitions in Article 1(2)(a) and (3)(b) of Directive 2004/17.

43 The fact that the definitions are substantially the same means that the same considerations are applicable to an interpretation of the concepts of service contract and service concession within the respective spheres of application of those two directives.

44 It follows that, if the transaction at issue in the main proceedings is categorised as a ‘service contract’ within the meaning of Directive 2004/17, such a contract must, in principle, be concluded in accordance with the procedures laid down in Articles 31 and 32 thereof. On the other hand, under Article 18 of that directive, if that transaction is categorised as a service concession, the directive is not applicable to it. In such circumstances, the awarding of the concession remains subject to the fundamental rules of the Treaty, in general, and to the principles of equal treatment and of non-discrimination on the ground of nationality, and the concomitant obligation of transparency, in particular (see, to that effect, Case C-324/98 Telaustria and Telefonadress [2000] ECR I-10745, paragraphs 60 to 62; Case C-231/03 Coname [2005] ECR I-7287, paragraphs 16 to 19; Case C-458/03 Parking Brixen [2005] ECR I-8585, paragraphs 46 to 49; and Case C-324/07 Coditel Brabant [2008] ECR I-0000, paragraph 25).

45 That is the context in which the referring court seeks to clarify the criteria which allow a distinction to be established between a service contract and a service concession.

The first and second questions

46 By its first and second questions, which it is appropriate to examine together, the referring court asks, in essence, whether, in a contract for the supply of services, the fact that the supplier does not receive consideration directly from the contracting authority, but is entitled to collect payment under private law from third parties, is sufficient, in itself, for the contract in question to be categorised as a service concession, within the meaning of Article 1(3)(b) of Directive 2004/17. If that question is answered in the negative, the referring court asks whether such a contract must be categorised as a service concession where the supplier assumes all, or at least to a predominant extent, the risk which the contracting authority runs in operating the service, even if that risk is significantly limited from the outset on account of the rules of public law governing the service.

47 Advocating a reply in the affirmative to the first question, WAZV Gotha, Stadtwirtschaft and WAL, and the German and Czech Governments, maintain that the fact that the supplier is remunerated by way of a payment collected from the users of the service in question is sufficient for the transaction to be categorised as a service concession.

48 By contrast, Eurawasser and the Commission contend that it is necessary, in addition, that the supplier assume the financial risk of operating the service in question.

49 It must be noted, in that regard, that Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/17 provides that ‘supply, works and service contracts’ are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more contracting entities referred to in Article 2(2) of that directive, and one or more contractors, suppliers, or service providers.

50 Under Article 1(3) of Directive 2004/17, a ‘service concession’ is a contract of the same type as a service contract except for the fact that the consideration for the provision of services consists either solely in the right to exploit the service, or in that right together with payment.

51 It is clear from a comparison of those two definitions that the difference between a service contract and a service concession lies in the consideration for the provision of services. A service contract involves consideration which is paid directly by the contracting authority to the service provider (see, to that effect, Parking Brixen, paragraph 39) while, for a service concession, the consideration for the provision of services consists in the right to exploit the service, either alone, or together with payment.

52 The questions referred take, explicitly, as their starting point the fact that the contract in question provides that the supplier does not receive consideration directly from the contracting authority, but receives payment under private law, which it is authorised by the contracting authority to collect from third parties.

53 In the light of the criterion set out in paragraph 51 of this judgment, the fact that the service provider is remunerated by payments from third parties, in this case from users of the service in question, is one means of exercising the right, granted to the provider, to exploit the service.

54 That criterion had already been established by the case-law of the Court prior to the entry into force of Directive 2004/17. According to that case-law, a service concession existed where the agreed method of remuneration consisted in the right of the service provider to exploit for payment his own service (see, to that effect, Telaustria and Telefonadress, paragraph 58; order in Case C-358/00 Buchhändler-Vereinigung [2002] ECR I-4685, paragraphs 27 and 28; Case C-382/05 Commission v Italy [2007] ECR I-6657, paragraph 34; and Case C-437/07 Commission v Italy [2008] not published in the ECR, paragraph 29).

55 It is irrelevant, in that regard, whether the remuneration is governed by private or public law.

56 The Court has recognised the existence of a service concession, inter alia, where the service provider's remuneration came from payments made by users of a public car park, of public service transport and of a teledistribution network (see Parking Brixen, paragraph 40; Case C-410/04 ANAV [2006] ECR I-3303, paragraph 16; and Coditel Brabant, paragraph 24).

57 It follows therefrom that, in the case of a contract for the supply of services, the fact that the supplier is not remunerated directly by the contracting authority, but is entitled to collect payment from third parties, meets the requirement of consideration laid down in Article 1(3)(b) of Directive 2004/17.

58 That finding means, however, that the concepts of 'the right to exploit' and 'consideration for the provision [of services]', which appear in Article 1(3)(b) of Directive 2004/17, need to be explained.

59 It is clear from the case law of the Court that, when the agreed method of remuneration consists in the right for the provider to exploit the service it is providing, that method of remuneration means that the provider takes the risk of operating the services in question (see, to that effect, Parking Brixen, paragraph 40; Case C-382/05 Commission v Italy, paragraph 34; and Case C-437/07 Commission v Italy, paragraph 29).

60 On that issue, the parties which have submitted observations have presented, either as their primary argument, or in the alternative, diverging views.

61 WAZV Gotha claims that the fact that the supplier assumes the risk of operating the service, in circumstances such as those in the case in the main proceedings, is sufficient for it to be categorised as a service concession.

62 Stadtwirtschaft, WAL and the Czech Government contend that the supplier is not required to assume all of that risk. It would suffice were it to assume a predominant share of that risk.

63 The German Government submits that a service concession exists, since the risk assumed by the supplier in connection with the operation of the service is not marginal.

64 Eurawasser takes the view that, in the transaction at issue in the main proceedings, there is no significant risk which can be transferred to the supplier by the contracting authority. Therefore, the transaction should be categorised as a service contract and not a concession.

65 The Commission submits that there must be a significant risk in operating the service, which, however, does not necessarily have to correspond to the financial risk usually run on an open market. A service contract in which the financial risk is reduced to a minimum by the public authorities cannot be categorised as a service concession.

66 In that regard, it must be stated that risk is inherent in the economic operation of the service.

67 If the contracting authority continues to bear all of the risk by not exposing the supplier to the vagaries of the market, the awarding of the right to operate the service requires that the formalities provided for in Directive 2004/17 be applied, with a view to safeguarding transparency and competition.

68 In the complete absence of a transfer to the service provider of the risk connected with operating the service, the transaction concerned is a service contract (see, to that effect, Case C-234/03 Contse and Others [2005] ECR I-9315, paragraph 22; Case C-382/05 Commission v Italy, paragraphs 35 to 37; and, by analogy, in relation to a works concession, Case C-437/07 Commission v Italy, paragraphs 30 and 32 to 35). As was stated in paragraph 51 of this judgment, in the case of a service contract, the consideration does not consist in the right to exploit the service.

69 The questions referred start from the premise that the supply of the service in question in the main proceedings involves very limited financial risks, even in the event that that service is provided by the contracting authority, on account of the application of the rules governing the sector of activity concerned.

70 According to some of the arguments submitted to the Court, for the transaction in question to constitute a concession in such circumstances, it is necessary that the risk transferred to the concession holder be a significant risk.

71 Those arguments cannot be accepted unreservedly.

72 It is not unusual that certain sectors of activity, in particular sectors involving public service utilities, such as the distribution of water and the disposal of sewage, are subject to rules which may have the effect of limiting the financial risks entailed.

73 First, the detailed rules of public law, to which the economic and financial operation of the service is subject, facilitate the supervision of how that service is operated, and scale down the factors which may threaten transparency and distort competition.

74 Second, it must remain open to the contracting authorities, acting in all good faith, to ensure the supply of services by way of a concession, if they consider that to be the best method of ensuring the public service in question, even if the risk linked to such an operation is limited.

75 Moreover, it would not be reasonable to expect a public authority granting a concession to create conditions which were more competitive and involved greater financial risk than those which, on account of the rules governing the sector in question, exist in that sector.

76 In such circumstances, as the contracting authority has no influence on the detailed rules of public law governing the service, it is impossible for it to introduce and, therefore, to transfer risk factors which are excluded by those rules.

77 In any event, even if the risk run by the contracting authority is very limited, it is necessary that the contracting authority transfer to the concession holder all, or at least a significant share, of the operating risk which it faces, in order for a service concession to be found to exist.

78 It is for the national court to assess whether there has been a transfer of all, or a significant share, of the risk faced by the contracting authority.

79 To that end, the general risks resulting from amendments to the rules, made in the course of performance of the contract, cannot be taken into account.

80 Therefore, the answer to the first and second questions is that, in relation to a contract for the supply of services, the fact that the supplier does not receive consideration directly from the contracting authority, but is entitled to collect payment under private law from third parties, is sufficient for that contract to be categorised as a ‘service concession’ within the meaning of Article 1(3)(b) of Directive 2004/17, where the supplier assumes all, or at least a significant share, of the operating risk faced by the contracting authority, even if that risk is, from the outset, very limited on account of the detailed rules of public law governing that service.

The third question

81 In the light of the reply given to the first and second questions, it is not necessary to reply to the third question.

Costs

82 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby rules:

In relation to a contract for the supply of services, the fact that the supplier does not receive consideration directly from the contracting authority, but is entitled to collect payment under private law from third parties, is sufficient for the contract in question to be categorised as a 'service concession' within the meaning of Article 1(3)(b) of Directive 2004/17/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 coordinating the procurement procedures of entities operating in the water, energy, transport and postal services sectors, where the supplier assumes all, or at least a significant share, of the operating risk faced by the contracting authority, even if that risk is, from the outset, very limited on account of the detailed rules of public law governing that service.

JUDGMENT OF THE COURT (Third Chamber)

29 April 2010 (*)

(Failure of a Member State to fulfil obligations – Public service contracts – Articles 43 EC and 49 EC – Directives 92/50/EEC and 2004/18/EC – Public emergency services – Emergency ambulance and qualified patient transport services – Obligation of transparency – Article 45 EC – Activities connected with the exercise of official authority – Article 86(2) EC – Services of general economic interest)

In Case C-160/08,

ACTION under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, brought on 16 April 2008,

THE COURT (Third Chamber), composed of K. Lenaerts (Rapporteur), President of the Chamber, E. Juhász, G. Arestis, J. Malenovský and T. von Danwitz, Judges, Advocate General: V. Trstenjak,

Registrar: R. Grass,

having regard to the written procedure,

after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 11 February 2010,

gives the following

Judgment

1 By its application, the Commission of the European Communities requests that the Court declare that, by failing to make a public call for tenders or to award contracts in the field of emergency ambulance and qualified patient transport services (‘public ambulance services’) transparently and by failing to publish notices of contracts awarded, the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1) and Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114) and to observe the principles of the freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services laid down by Articles 43 EC and 49 EC.

Legal context

Directive 92/50

2 According to Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50, 'public service contracts' are to mean contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority.

3 Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50 states:

'Contracting authorities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different service providers.'

4 Article 7(1) provides that the directive is to apply to public service contracts where the estimated value, net of value added tax, is not less than EUR 200 000.

5 Article 10 of Directive 92/50 states:

'Contracts which have as their object services listed in both Annexes I A and I B shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI where the value of the services listed in Annex I A is greater than the value of the services listed in Annex I B. Where this is not the case, they shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.'

6 The Titles referred to in Article 10 of Directive 92/50, which apply in their entirety in the circumstances referred to in the first sentence of Article 10, concern, respectively, the choice of award procedures and the rules governing design contests (Title III; Articles 11 to 13), common rules in the technical field (Title IV; Article 14), common advertising rules (Title V; Articles 15 to 22) and common rules on participation, criteria for qualitative selection and criteria for the award of contracts (Title VI; Articles 23 to 37).

7 Article 14 of Directive 92/50 concerns the technical specifications which must be given in the documents relating to the contract.

8 Article 16 of Directive 92/50 provides:

'1. Contracting authorities who have awarded a public contract or have held a design contest shall send a notice of the results of the award procedure to the Office for Official Publications of the European Communities.

2. The notices shall be published:

– in the case of public contracts for services listed in Annex I A, in accordance with Articles 17 to 20, – in the case of design contests, in accordance with Article 17.

3. In the case of public contracts for services listed in Annex I B, the contracting authorities shall indicate in the notice whether they agree on its publication.

9 The services listed in Annex I A to Directive 92/50 include, under category 2, '[l]and transport services …, including armoured car services, and courier services, except transport of mail' and, under category 3, '[a]ir transport services of passengers and freight, except transport of mail'. The services listed in Annex I B to Directive 92/50 include, under category 25, '[h]ealth and social services'.

Directive 2004/18

10 Article 1(2)(a) and (d) of Directive 2004/18 includes the following definitions:

‘(a) “Public contracts” are contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between one or more economic operators and one or more contracting authorities and having as their object the execution of works, the supply of products or the provision of services within the meaning of this Directive.

(d) “Public service contracts” are public contracts other than public works or supply contracts having as their object the provision of services referred to in Annex II.

…’

11 Article 2 of Directive 2004/18 provides:

‘Contracting authorities shall treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and shall act in a transparent way.’

12 According to Article 7(b) of Directive 2004/18, the directive is to apply to public service contracts which have a value exclusive of value added tax estimated to be equal to or greater than EUR 249 000. That figure was successively reduced to EUR 236 000 by Commission Regulation (EC) No 1874/2004 of 28 October 2004 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts (OJ 2004 L 326, p. 17) and then to EUR 211 000 by Commission Regulation (EC) No 2083/2005 of 19 December 2005 amending Directives 2004/17/EC and 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council in respect of their application thresholds for the procedures for the award of contracts (OJ 2005 L 333, p. 28).

13 Directive 2004/18 includes a provision, Article 22, under Title II headed ‘Rules on public contracts’, which states:

‘Contracts which have as their object services listed both in Annex II A and in Annex II B shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 23 to 55 where the value of the services listed in Annex II A is greater than the value of the services listed in Annex II B. In other cases, contracts shall be awarded in accordance with Article 23 and Article 35(4).’

14 Articles 23 to 55 of Directive 2004/18, which apply in their entirety in the circumstances referred to in the first sentence of Article 22 of that directive, set out, in order, the specific rules governing specifications and contract documents (Articles 23 to 27), the rules of procedure (Articles 28 to 34), the rules on advertising and transparency (Articles 35 to 43) and the rules relating to the conduct of the procedure (Articles 44 to 55).

15 Article 23 of Directive 2004/18 concerns the technical specifications which must be set out in the contract documentation.

16 Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18 provides:

‘Contracting authorities which have awarded a public contract or concluded a framework agreement shall send a notice of the results of the award procedure no later than 48 days after the award of the contract or the conclusion of the framework agreement.

In the case of public contracts for services listed in Annex II B, the contracting authorities shall indicate in the notice whether they agree to its publication. …

…’

17 The services referred to under categories 2 and 3 of Annex II A and under category 25 of Annex II B to Directive 2004/18 respectively are identical to those referred to under the corresponding categories of Annexes I A and I B to Directive 92/50.

Facts

18 The Commission received a number of complaints from, inter alia, undertakings established in Member States other than the Federal Republic of Germany concerning the award of contracts for public ambulance services in the Federal Republic of Germany.

General background

19 In Germany, the organisation of the emergency services falls within the competence of the Länder.

20 In most Länder, emergency services are provided using a 'dual' system ('duales System'), also known as the 'separation model' ('Trennungsmodell'). This is based on a distinction between public emergency services, which account for approximately 70% of all emergency services, and the provision of emergency services on the basis of authorisations granted under the relevant laws of the Länder, which account for approximately 30% of all such services.

21 Public emergency services normally cover emergency ambulance and qualified patient transport services. Emergency ambulance services consist in the conveyance in an emergency vehicle or ambulance, with appropriate medical care, of persons with life-threatening injuries or conditions. Qualified patient transport consists in the conveyance in a patient transport ambulance, with appropriate medical care, of persons who are ill, injured or otherwise in need of help but who are not emergency patients. These two types of service are generally available to the population 24 hours a day throughout the whole of the area concerned and, more often than not, involve the operation of an ambulance station with personnel and response vehicles permanently available.

22 Medical services are available in the case of emergency ambulance services as well as, to a lesser extent, in the case of qualified patient transport. However, the majority of incidents involving emergency ambulance services and all incidents involving qualified patient transport proceed without a doctor being in attendance. In the case of emergency ambulance services, medical services are provided mainly by ambulance personnel. The services of emergency doctors are normally governed by separate agreements with hospitals.

23 In the field of public emergency services, the local authorities, in their capacity as the authorities responsible for organising those services, conclude contracts with providers for the provision of such services to the entire population of the area within their remit. Payment for the services in question is made either directly by the contracting authority in accordance with the 'tender' model, the only one to which the present action relates, or in the form of charges levied directly by the contractor on patients or sickness funds, in accordance with the 'concession' model.

24 The complainants to the Commission claimed that, in Germany, contracts for public ambulance services are not, as a rule, covered by contract notices published at European Union level, nor are they awarded in a transparent way. Some complainants stated that the circumstances leading to the lodging of their complaint reflect general practice in Germany.

25 The Commission's investigations revealed that, between 2001 and 2006, only 13 contract notices from 11 different local authorities were published in the Official Journal of the European Communities or in the Official Journal of the European Union in relation to the provision of emergency ambulance or qualified patient transport services. In that same period, the number of notices of the results of the award of a contract was also very limited, only two such notices having been published.

Circumstances of the present action

26 The cases complained of to the Commission and which the latter submits as examples of the practice to which the present action relates concern the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony.

Land of Saxony-Anhalt

27 According to the Commission, the city of Magdeburg has used an authorisation procedure ('Genehmigungsverfahren') for the award of contracts for pecuniary interest for public ambulance services since October 2005. The services cover the provision of personnel and vehicles for emergency ambulance or qualified patient transport services for the period 2007 to 2011. The contract has a total annual value of EUR 7.84 million. No contract notice was published at European Union level.

Land of North Rhine-Westphalia

28 According to the Commission, in 2004 the city of Bonn awarded a contract for public ambulance services for the period from 1 January 2005 to 31 December 2008. The object of the contract concerned was, inter alia, the operation of four ambulance stations. The total value of the contract was at least EUR 5.28 million. A contract notice was published, but at national, not European Union level. At least one tenderer was unsuccessful following the submission of his expression of interest, and the procurement procedure was eventually suspended for lack of an economic outcome. The contract in question was ultimately awarded to the incumbent service provider.

29 Again according to the Commission, in 1998 an undertaking submitted an expression of interest to the town of Witten in relation to taking over the operation of the Witten-Herbede ambulance station. However, the operation of that ambulance station, representing a contract with an annual value of EUR 945 753, was awarded to the Deutsche Rote Kreuz (German Red Cross; 'DRK'). No contract notice was published at European Union level.

Land of Lower Saxony

30 According to the Commission, in 2004 the Region of Hanover organised, for the first time, a procurement procedure for the provision of public ambulance services within its area. Only operators who were already responsible for such services at that time, namely the Arbeiter-Samariter-Bund ('ASB'), the DRK, the Johanniter-Unfall-Hilfe ('JUH') and RKT GmbH, were authorised to participate in that procedure. The value of the contract, covering the period between 1 January 2005 and 31 December 2009, was in the region of EUR 65 million.

31 Again according to the Commission, in 1993 the administrative district of Hamelin-Pyrmont made the district association of the DRK responsible for the provision of public ambulance services within its territory. The contract, which had an initial duration of 10 years, was not terminated. In 2003 it was renewed for 10 years without any contract notice being published. In addition, a new ambulance station was established in 1999 in the municipality of Emmerthal, the operation of which was also entrusted to the DRK without any prior publication of a contract notice. The total value of those contracts was EUR 7.2 million per year.

32 The Commission obtained information that the district association of the DRK had been providing public ambulance services in the administrative district of Uelzen since 1992. The contract awarded by that district to the district association of the DRK was extended in 2002 to encompass the operation of the ambulance station at Bad Bevensen without a contract notice being published. It has a total value of EUR 4.45 million per year.

Land of Saxony

33 According to information obtained by the Commission, the contracts between the Rettungszweckverband Westsachsen and the ASB, DRK, JUH and the Zwickau fire service had an initial duration of four years and cover the administrative districts of Chemnitzer Land, Aue-Schwarzenberg, Zwickauer Land and the town of Zwickau. In 2003 those contracts, representing a total value of EUR 7.9 million per year, were renewed for four years without a contract notice being published. On their expiry they were renewed until 31 December 2008.

34 The contracts between the Rettungszweckverband Chemnitz/Stollberg and the ASB, DRK, JUH and the Chemnitz fire service had an initial duration of four years and cover the administrative district of Stollberg and the city of Chemnitz. On 1 September 2002 those contracts, representing a total value of EUR 3.3 million per year, were renewed for a further four years without a contract notice being published. On their expiry they were renewed until 31 December 2008.

35 The contracts between the Rettungszweckverband Vogtland and the ASB, DRK, JUH, the private Plauen ambulance service and the Plauen fire service had an initial duration of four years and cover the administrative district of Vogtland and the town of Plauen. Those contracts, with a total annual value of EUR 3.9 million, were concluded without a contract notice being published and came into effect on 1 January 2002 or 1 January 2004. On their expiry they were renewed until 31 December 2008.

The pre-litigation procedure

36 In a letter of formal notice dated 10 April 2006, the Commission notified the Federal Republic of Germany that:

– with regard to the award of contracts for pecuniary interest relating to the emergency services in which transport services within the meaning of categories 2 or 3 of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 or Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 are predominant, the Federal Republic of Germany may have infringed, until 31 January 2006, Article 10 of Directive 92/50 in conjunction with Titles III to VI thereof and, from 1 February 2006, Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55 thereof; and

– with regard to the award of contracts for pecuniary interest relating to the emergency services in which health services within the meaning of category 25 of Annex I B to Directive 92/50 or Annex II B to Directive 2004/18 are predominant, the Federal Republic of Germany may have infringed, until 31 January 2006, Article 10 of Directive 92/50 in conjunction with Article 16 thereof and, from 1 February 2006, Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 in conjunction with Article 35(4) thereof, and may, in any event, have infringed the principles of the freedom of establishment and of the freedom to provide services contained in Articles 43 EC and 49 EC, in particular the prohibition of discrimination that is inherent in those principles.

37 The Federal Republic of Germany replied to that letter of formal notice by a letter of 10 July 2006 in which it contended, inter alia, that the tasks which are delegated to the public emergency services are organised in accordance with public-law rules and that their implementation is a matter of State sovereignty. According to the defendant, agreements relating to ambulance services cannot, therefore, be categorised as ‘public service contracts’.

38 The Commission was not satisfied with that response and, on 15 December 2006, sent a reasoned opinion to the Federal Republic of Germany in which it maintained as they stood the complaints set out in the letter of formal notice and called on the Federal Republic of Germany to adopt the measures necessary to end that infringement within a period of two months from receipt of the opinion.

39 The Federal Republic of Germany having maintained its position in its letter of reply to the reasoned opinion dated 22 February 2007, the Commission decided to bring the present action.

The action

Admissibility

40 Since the conditions for admissibility of an action and of the complaints set out therein are a matter of public policy, the Court may consider them of its own motion in accordance with Article 92(2) of its Rules of Procedure. Furthermore, it is entitled to ascertain of its own motion whether the procedural safeguards conferred by the European Union’s legal order have been complied with (see, to that effect, Case C-291/89 Interhotel v Commission [1991] ECR I-2257, paragraphs 14 and 15).

41 It should be pointed out that, in an action for failure to fulfil obligations, the purpose of the pre-litigation procedure is to give the Member State concerned an opportunity, on the one hand, to comply with obligations under European Union law and, on the other, to avail itself of its right to defend itself against the charges formulated by the Commission (Case C-350/02 Commission v Netherlands [2004] ECR I-6213, paragraph 18).

42 The proper conduct of that procedure constitutes an essential guarantee required by the EC Treaty not only in order to protect the rights of the Member State concerned, but also so as to ensure that any contentious procedure will have a clearly defined dispute as its subject-matter (see, to that effect, Commission v Netherlands, paragraph 19).

43 It follows that the subject-matter of proceedings under Article 226 EC is delimited by the pre-litigation procedure governed by that provision and cannot, therefore, be extended during the judicial procedure. The Commission's reasoned opinion and the application must be based on the same grounds and pleas, with the result that the Court cannot examine a ground of complaint which was not formulated in the reasoned opinion, which for its part must contain a cogent and detailed exposition of the reasons which led the Commission to the conclusion that the Member State concerned had failed to fulfil one of its obligations under the Treaty (see Commission v Netherlands, paragraph 20, and Case C-441/02 Commission v Germany [2006] ECR I-3449, paragraphs 59 and 60).

44 On that basis, it is incumbent on the Commission, during the pre-litigation procedure, to indicate the specific provision or provisions which define the obligation with which the Member State is alleged to have failed to comply (see Case C-437/04 Commission v Belgium [2007] ECR I-2513, paragraph 39).

45 In the present case it should be noted, on the one hand, that, both in the letter of formal notice and in the reasoned opinion, the Commission limited the complaint alleging an infringement of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC to the award of contracts for public ambulance services characterised by the predominance of the value of health services within the meaning of Annex I B to Directive 92/50 or Annex II B to Directive 2004/18 over the value of transport services within the meaning of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 or Annex II A to Directive 2004/18.

46 With regard to the award of contracts of such services characterised, conversely, by the predominance of the value of transport services over the value of health services, the Commission's complaints during the pre-litigation procedure related to an infringement of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. By contrast, no mention was made in the letter of formal notice or in the reasoned opinion of a complaint alleging an infringement of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC in connection with the award of those contracts.

47 However, in its application, the Commission now puts forward a complaint also alleging an infringement of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC with regard to the award of the contracts referred to in the previous paragraph, which constitutes an unlawful extension of the scope of the alleged infringement, as defined at the stage of the pre-litigation procedure. Therefore, the complaint alleging an infringement of those articles must be held inadmissible in so far as it relates to the award of those contracts.

48 On the other hand, in so far as the present action must be understood, on the basis of certain passages in the application, to include a complaint alleging an infringement in the relevant procurement procedures of Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50 or of Article 2 of Directive 2004/18, it must be noted that there was no mention at all of those two provisions as being the object of an infringement alleged by the Commission at the stage of the pre-litigation procedure. The complaint alleging an infringement of those provisions is, therefore, also inadmissible.

49 Finally, it must be pointed out that, under Article 38(1) in conjunction with Article 42(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the subject-matter of the claim must be defined in the application, and that a claim put forward for the first time in the reply modifies the original subject-matter of the application and must therefore be regarded as a new claim and, accordingly, be rejected as inadmissible.

50 In the present case, it must be observed that the Commission expressly stated in its application that, although the procurement practice at issue also exists in other Länder, the present action is confined to procurement in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony.

51 In those circumstances, the Commission's request, contained in its reply, that the Court should hold that the practice at issue exists throughout the whole of the Federal Republic of Germany constitutes an unlawful extension of the original scope of the application. Therefore, the complaints put forward by the Commission must be held inadmissible in so far as they refer to Länder other than those identified in the previous paragraph.

52 It follows from this that the action must be declared inadmissible in so far as the applicant claims that the Court should find:

– an infringement of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC as regards the award of contracts for public ambulance services characterised by the predominance of the value of transport services within the meaning of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 or Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 over the value of health services within the meaning of Annex I B to Directive 92/50 or Annex II B to Directive 2004/18;

– an infringement of Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50 or of Article 2 of Directive 2004/18; and – the existence of a practice of awarding contracts for public emergency services that is contrary to European Union law in Länder other than the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony.

Substance

Arguments of the parties

53 The Commission alleges, first, that there has been an infringement of Articles 10 and 16 of Directive 92/50 and of Articles 22 and 35(4) of Directive 2004/18. It submits that, irrespective of the relative importance in the various contracts referred to in its action of the value of transport services and of health services, the results of the award of those contracts were not published in any way.

54 The Commission also alleges a breach of the principle of non-discrimination contained in Articles 43 EC and 49 EC, which imposes obligations on contracting authorities over and above those arising under Directives 92/50 and 2004/18. In that respect, the condition relating to the existence of a certain cross-border interest, established in Case C-507/03 Commission v Ireland [2007] ECR I-9777, paragraphs 29 and 30, is satisfied in the present case, in view of the origin of the complaints sent to the Commission and the significant economic value of the services in question.

55 The Commission submits that the cases complained of reveal a general practice of granting contracts for public ambulance services without adhering to provisions of European Union law which are designed to ensure that such contracts are transparent and subject to competition. The very limited number of procurement procedures launched at European level by local authorities – 13 contract notices published by 11 of over 400 administrative and urban districts in Germany in a period of 6 years – confirms the existence of such a practice.

56 Second, the Commission states that the failure by the German regional authorities to observe European Union rules on public service contracts cannot be justified by considerations relating to the exercise of State sovereignty.

57 It maintains that the services at issue in the present case do not fall within the scope of Articles 45 EC and 55 EC, given that they are not, as such, directly and specifically connected with the exercise of official authority. It states, in particular, that those services do involve a specific power of coercion or special powers of intervention on the part of their providers.

58 Neither the use of flashing blue lights and sirens, nor the recognition that providers of such services have right of way under the German Highway Code, nor the fact that emergency rescue measures can be taken without the injured person's consent or by ambulance staff who are not fully medically trained, constitutes a manifestation of such powers of coercion or of intervention.

59 Even if, as the Federal Republic of Germany maintains, public emergency services constitute for the public bodies responsible for them a task that involves the direct and specific exercise of official authority, the functional integration into the planning, organisation and administration of those services of auxiliary staff responsible for providing ambulance services does not mean that such staff have official rights or powers of coercion.

60 Third, the Commission denies that Article 86(2) EC can reasonably be relied on in the present case. It claims that Case C-475/99 Ambulanz Glöckner [2001] ECR I-8089 is irrelevant for the purpose of assessing whether the practice at issue is in conformity with European Union law on public contracts and that, in order for that provision to be applicable, it would have to be demonstrated that the application of the rules of the internal market precludes the provision of a high-quality, efficient and profitable emergency service, which the Federal Republic of Germany has never actually claimed.

61 In the first place, the Federal Republic of Germany challenges some of the facts alleged by the Commission.

62 As regards, first of all, the procurement procedure organised by the city of Bonn, it claims that the unsuccessful tenderer was rejected on the ground that, owing to a lack of professional reliability, the tenderer in question had been refused renewal of the authorisation required under the law of the Land of North Rhine-Westphalia for the operation of private emergency services, which the authorities of that city had to take into account when awarding a public contract.

63 With regard, second, to the Bad Bevensen ambulance station, the defendant states that the sole object of the process documented by a contract concluded in April 2004 was the transfer or assignment to the district association of the DRK of the activities, staff and equipment of the joint municipality of Bevensen and of the July 1984 contract connecting that body with the administrative district of Uelzen. That April 2004 contract was a continuation of the original contract which, having been concluded in July 1984, did not fall within the scope of Directive 92/50. The April 2004 contract did not substantively modify the original contract, either in terms of its object, the geographic scope of the contract, the services provided or the method of financing.

64 Third, as regards the Land of Saxony, the Federal Republic of Germany states that the alleged infringement ended when the contracts renewed between 2002 and 2004 expired and when new rules of the Land entered into force in January 2005 requiring, from then on, the adoption of a transparent procedure for the procurement of public ambulance services.

65 In the second place, the Federal Republic of Germany, supported in that respect by the Kingdom of the Netherlands, contends that, as elements of public policy in respect of risk prevention and health protection, public ambulance services are covered by the exception under Articles 45 EC and 55 EC, which takes them outside the scope of European Union law on public contracts.

66 It states that the categorisation of the activity concerned under national law determines the assessment of its association with the exercise of official authority. In the present case, the organisation of public ambulance services, including contracts awarded to providers of those services, is governed by public-law rules. In addition, and above all, the activity entrusted to those providers is connected with the exercise of official authority, as evidenced by emergency vehicle drivers' right of way and associated features, namely the use of flashing blue lights and sirens.

67 The Federal Republic of Germany adds that activities associated with public ambulance services generally presuppose the existence of special powers, namely the planning, organisation and administration of services, the imposition of information and notification obligations on third parties, as well as decisions on the deployment of other specialist services and involvement in the appointment of members of staff of those services as civil service administrators. Those activities are based on close coordination between the various human and technical links in the 'emergency chain', which only an official authority is in a position to undertake on a permanent basis throughout the whole of the territory concerned.

68 The Federal Republic of Germany and the Kingdom of the Netherlands maintain that the fact that public emergency services are, as such, an official function of the public body responsible for them also militates in favour of a functional connection between the providers of those services and the exercise of official authority. The same applies to the collaboration between those providers and other operators also involved in the planning, organisation and administration of those services, such as the police, civil protection and fire services, which are responsible for prevention or protection and which can implement evacuation or security measures and roadblocks and provide assistance with admissions, for example of persons suffering mental illness, since such tasks and measures are typical of such an official function.

69 In the third place, the Federal Republic of Germany, again supported in this respect by the Kingdom of the Netherlands, puts forward in the alternative the argument that ambulance services fall within the definition of 'service of general economic interest' within the meaning of Article 86(2) EC, which entails authority to derogate not only from the competition rules (see Ambulanz Glöckner) but also from the fundamental freedoms and from the rules relating to public contracts.

70 It contends that a derogation from those freedoms and rules is necessary to enable cross-subsidisation between densely-populated geographic areas, where the provision of ambulance services is profitable, and areas of low population density, which are far less profitable in that regard.

71 The link that exists between the emergency and civil protection services also militates in favour of a derogation from the rules of European Union law relating to public contracts. The State's obligation to provide civil protection in major emergencies requires the protection of national health organisations which are obliged to provide assistance in such cases and effectively guarantee the availability of a large number of volunteers living in the vicinity of the emergency.

Findings of the Court

72 In view of the consequences arising from the application of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC and Article 55 EC, it is necessary to determine at the outset whether those provisions apply in the present case (see, to that effect, Case C-465/05 Commission v Italy [2007] ECR I-11091, paragraph 31).

– The exception under the first paragraph of Article 45 EC, in conjunction with Article 55 EC

73 According to the first paragraph of Article 45 EC, in conjunction with Article 55 EC, the provisions relating to the freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services do not extend to activities which in a Member State are connected, even occasionally, with the exercise of official authority.

74 As the Advocate General stated at point 51 of her Opinion, such activities are also excluded from the scope of directives which, like Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, are designed to implement the provisions of the Treaty relating to the freedom of establishment and the freedom to provide services.

75 It is necessary, therefore, to determine whether the ambulance service activities at issue in the present case are among the activities referred to in the first paragraph of Article 45 EC.

76 In that regard, it must be borne in mind that, as derogations from the fundamental rules of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, Articles 45 EC and 55 EC must be interpreted in a manner which limits their scope to what is strictly necessary in order to safeguard the interests which they allow the Member States to protect (see, in particular, Case 147/86 Commission v Greece [1988] ECR 1637, paragraph 7; Case C-451/03 Servizi Ausiliari Dottori Commercialisti [2006] ECR I-2941, paragraph 45; and Case C-438/08 Commission v Portugal [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 34).

77 Moreover, it has consistently been held that the review of the possible application of the exceptions laid down in Articles 45 EC and 55 EC must take into account the fact that the limits imposed by those articles on the exceptions referred to fall within European Union law (see, in particular, Case 2/74 Reyners, [1974] ECR 631, paragraph 50, and Commission v Portugal, paragraph 35).

78 According to settled case-law, the derogation provided for under those articles must be restricted to activities which, in themselves, are directly and specifically connected with the exercise of official authority (see Reyners, paragraph 45; Case C-42/92 Thijssen [1993] ECR I-4047, paragraph 8; and Commission v Portugal, paragraph 36).

79 As the Advocate General noted at point 58 of her Opinion, such a connection requires a sufficiently qualified exercise of prerogatives outside the general law, privileges of official power or powers of coercion.

80 In the present case, it must first be observed that a contribution to the protection of public health, which any individual may be called upon to make, in particular by assisting a person whose life or health are in danger, is not sufficient for there to be a connection with the exercise of official authority (see, to that effect, Case C-114/97 Commission v Spain [1998] ECR I-6717, paragraph 37, and Commission v Italy, paragraph 38).

81 As regards the right of ambulance service providers to use equipment such as flashing blue lights or sirens, and their acknowledged right of way with priority under the German Highway Code, they certainly reflect the overriding importance which the national legislature attaches to public health as against general road traffic rules.

82 However, such rights cannot, as such, be regarded as having a direct and specific connection with the exercise of official authority in the absence, on the part of the providers concerned, of official powers or of powers of coercion falling outside the scope of the general law for the purposes of ensuring that those rights are observed, which, as the parties agree, is within the competence of the police and judicial authorities (see, to that effect, Commission v Italy, paragraph 39, and Commission v Portugal, paragraph 44).

83 Nor can matters such as those raised by the Federal Republic of Germany – concerning special organisational powers in the field of the services delivered, the power to request information from third parties and the deployment of other specialist services, or even involvement in the appointment of civil service administrators in connection with the services at issue – be regarded as reflecting a sufficiently qualified exercise of official powers or of powers falling outside the scope of the general law.

84 As the Federal Republic of Germany also asserted, the fact that the provision of public ambulance services entails collaboration with the public authorities and with professional staff on whom official powers have been conferred, such as members of the police force, does not constitute evidence that the activities of those services have a connection with the exercise of official authority either (see, to that effect, Reyners, paragraph 51).

85 The same applies to the fact, also maintained by the Federal Republic of Germany, that agreements relating to the service contracts at issue come within the scope of public law and that the activities concerned are carried out on behalf of those public-law bodies which take on responsibility for public emergency services (see, to that effect, Case C-281/06 Jundt [2007] ECR I-12231, paragraphs 36 to 39).

86 It follows from this that the Court cannot accept that Articles 45 EC and 55 EC are applicable to the activities at issue in the present case.

87 It is, therefore, necessary to consider whether the infringement alleged by the Commission has been established.

– The infringement alleged by the Commission

88 As a preliminary point it must be noted, first of all, that it is clear from the particulars provided by the Commission in the written pleadings which it lodged with the Court that the present action is limited to the ‘tender’ model, just one of the various methods of providing public ambulance services that exist in the Federal Republic of Germany, under which the provider to whom a contract is awarded is paid directly by the contracting authority with which it concluded the contract or by a funding body connected with that contracting authority.

89 Second, the Federal Republic of Germany did not challenge the Commission’s assertion that the local authorities which awarded the various contracts identified in the action are contracting authorities within the meaning of Article 1(b) of Directive 92/50 or Article 1(9) of Directive 2004/18 (see, to that effect, Case C-126/03 Commission v Germany [2004] ECR I-11197, paragraph 18).

90 Third, the fact, as maintained by the Federal Republic of Germany, that the agreements by which those contracts were awarded are governed by public law cannot eclipse the existence of the contract required by Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50 or Article 1(2)(a) of Directive 2004/18. As the Commission argued, on the contrary, it militates in favour of the existence of such a contract (see, to that effect, Case C-399/98 Ordine degli Architetti and Others [2001] ECR I-5409, paragraph 73).

91 The fact that those contracts are in writing and for pecuniary interest is not in any way denied by the Federal Republic of Germany, which, moreover, does not dispute the Commission's statistics showing that the respective value of the various contracts at issue is considerably higher than the thresholds set under Article 7 of Directive 92/50 or of Directive 2004/18.

92 Fourth, it is also common ground between the parties that the emergency ambulance or qualified patient transport services at issue in the present case are within category 2 or 3 of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 or of Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 as well as category 25 of Annex I B to Directive 92/50 or of Annex II B to Directive 2004/18, and that, therefore, the contracts for such services fall within the scope of Article 10 of Directive 92/50 or of Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 (see, to that effect, Case C-76/97 Tögel [1998] ECR I-5357, paragraph 40).

93 On the other hand, the Federal Republic of Germany denies certain facts alleged by the Commission. It also challenges the Commission's assertion that those facts reveal a general practice in the award of contracts for public ambulance services.

(i) The facts alleged

94 It is settled case-law that, where the Commission relies on detailed complaints revealing repeated failures to comply with European Union law, it is incumbent on the Member State concerned to contest specifically the facts alleged in those complaints (see Case C-489/06 Commission v Greece [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 40 and the case-law cited).

95 In the present case, the Federal Republic of Germany does not deny the veracity of the facts claimed by the Commission in respect of the contract awarded by the city of Magdeburg in the Land of Saxony-Anhalt, the contract associated with the operation of the Witten-Herbede ambulance station in the Land of North Rhine-Westphalia and the contracts awarded by the Hanover Region and by the administrative district of Hamelin-Pyrmont in the Land of Lower Saxony, these being the contracts at issue which are referred to in paragraphs 27 and 29 to 31 of the present judgment.

96 By contrast, the Federal Republic of Germany objects to the Commission's factual claims in respect of the contracts awarded by the city of Bonn, by the administrative district of Uelzen and by the various public authorities of the Land of Saxony.

97 As regards, first of all, the contract awarded by the city of Bonn, referred to in paragraph 28 of the present judgment, the information given by the Federal Republic of Germany concerning the reasons for the rejection of a German tenderer cannot eclipse the Commission's allegations – unchallenged by the Federal Republic of Germany – concerning the failure, in connection with that contract, to observe European Union rules on transparency in relation to public contracts.

98 Next, as regards the contract awarded by the administrative district of Uelzen, referred to in paragraph 32 of the present judgment, it is apparent from the parties' exchanges before the Court that the Commission's complaint relates to the fact that the object of the contract concluded between that district and the district association of the DRK in 1984 was extended in 2004 to encompass the operation of the ambulance station at Bad Bevensen, contrary to European Union law on public contracts.

99 In that regard, it must be observed that an amendment to the initial contract may be regarded as being material and, therefore, as constituting the new award of a contract for the purposes of Directive 92/50 or of Directive 2004/18, inter alia, when it extends the scope of the contract considerably to encompass services not initially covered (see, to that effect, Case C-454/06 pressetext Nachrichtenagentur [2008] ECR I-4401, paragraph 36).

100 In this instance, it is apparent from the information in the documents before the Court that the value of the contract relating to the operation of the ambulance station at Bad Bevensen amounts to EUR 673 719.92, which is considerably higher than the thresholds set under Article 7 of Directive 92/50 and of Directive 2004/18.

101 In those circumstances, the extension of the contract referred to in paragraph 98 of the present judgment must, as maintained by the Commission, be regarded as a material amendment of the original contract, which would have required compliance with the relevant provisions of European Union law on public contracts.

102 Finally, as regards the contracts awarded in the Land of Saxony, referred to in paragraphs 33 to 35 of the present judgment, the Federal Republic of Germany's claim that the infringement complained of ended on the expiry of the contracts renewed between 2002 and 2004 and the entry into force in January 2005 of new rules of the Land introducing a transparent procedure for the procurement of public ambulance services does not mean that the Court can dismiss the Commission's allegations – unchallenged by the defendant – that there was no transparency at European Union level in the renewal under the previous rules of those contracts until 31 December 2008.

103 The situation complained of by the Commission in respect of the various contracts of the Land of Saxony was therefore ongoing as at the date on which the period prescribed in the reasoned opinion expired, namely 16 February 2007, which is the relevant date for assessing the existence of the alleged infringement (see, to that effect, Case C-562/07 Commission v Spain [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 23).

104 It follows that all the facts alleged by the Commission must be deemed to have been established.

(ii) The practice alleged

105 The Federal Republic of Germany complains that the Commission relied on individual cases in order to plead the existence of a general practice of awarding contracts for public ambulance services contrary to European Union law.

106 In that regard, it must be noted that the Commission may seek a finding that European Union law has not been complied with because a general practice contrary thereto has been adopted by the authorities of a Member State, using particular situations to shed light on that practice (see, to that effect, Case C-248/05 Commission v Ireland [2007] ECR I-9261, paragraph 64 and the case-law cited).

107 A finding that there has been a failure to fulfil obligations on the basis of the administrative practice followed in a Member State none the less involves production by the Commission of sufficiently documented and detailed proof of the alleged practice. It must be apparent from such proof that that administrative practice is, to some degree, of a consistent and general nature. The Commission may not rely on any presumption for that purpose (see Case C-156/04 Commission v Greece [2007] ECR I-4129, paragraph 50 and the case-law cited, and Case C-489/06 Commission v Greece, paragraph 48).

108 When the Commission has adduced sufficient evidence to show that the authorities of the defendant Member State have developed a repeated and persistent practice which is contrary to European Union law, it is incumbent on that Member State to challenge in substance and in detail the information produced and the consequences flowing therefrom (see Case C-494/01 Commission v Ireland [2005] ECR I-3331, paragraph 47, and Case C-248/05 Commission v Ireland, paragraph 69).

109 In the present case, faced with the Commission's factual assertions concerning repeated instances of a failure to comply with European Union law in relation to the award of contracts for public ambulance services in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony, it is apparent from paragraphs 95 to 104 of the present judgment that the Federal Republic of Germany has been unable to disprove the facts complained of. Moreover, it has produced no evidence that other contracts awarded on the basis of the tender model in those Länder were so awarded in accordance with European Union law on public contracts.

110 On the contrary, as the Advocate General noted at point 150 of her Opinion, the Commission's statements – which were not challenged by the Federal Republic of Germany – attesting to the very limited number of cases in which contracts for public ambulance services were awarded in accordance with European Union law, corroborate the existence in the four Länder concerned of a practice that goes beyond the individual cases highlighted by the Commission in the present action.

111 It follows from the foregoing that the practice alleged by the Commission must be deemed to have been established as regards the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony.

112 It is therefore necessary to determine whether there have been infringements of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 and of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC as alleged by the Commission.

(iii) Infringements relating to failure to comply with Directive 92/50 or with Directive 2004/18, and with Articles 43 EC and 49 EC

113 In its application the Commission submits that, where contracts awarded for public ambulance services are characterised by the predominance of the value of transport services as compared with the value of health services, the practice in question constitutes an infringement of Article 10 of Directive 92/50 in conjunction with Titles III to VI thereof or, since 1 February 2006, of Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55 thereof. In accordance with those various titles or provisions, it is, inter alia, incumbent on the contracting authority to publish a contract notice at European Union level for the purposes of awarding the contract in question and to ensure that the results of the award of that contract are published.

114 Where contracts awarded for public ambulance services are characterised by the predominance of the value of health services as compared with the value of transport services, the Commission claims that the practice in question constitutes an infringement of Article 10 of Directive 92/50 in conjunction with Article 16 thereof or, since 1 February 2006, of Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 in conjunction with Article 35(4) thereof. Those provisions, in essence, require the contracting authority to ensure that the results of the award of the contract concerned are published.

115 The Commission also raises a complaint concerning an infringement of Articles 43 EC and 49 EC, which, however, as is apparent from paragraphs 45 to 47 and 52 of the present judgment, is admissible only in so far as it relates to the award of contracts in the circumstances referred to in the preceding paragraph.

116 In that regard, it must be borne in mind that, according to settled case-law, in proceedings under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations, it is for the Commission to prove the alleged failure by placing before the Court all the information needed to enable the Court to establish that the obligation has not been fulfilled, and in so doing the Commission may not rely on any presumptions (see Case C-246/08 Commission v Finland [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 52 and the case-law cited).

117 As the Advocate General stated at point 113 of her Opinion, the Commission's obligation to establish precisely the specific object of the alleged failure is critical if the defendant Member State is to have an accurate understanding of the measures it is required to adopt, in the event of such a failure being determined, in order to ensure that the situation complained of is restored to full conformity with European Union law.

118 In the present case, it follows from the documents before the Court that, having stated in the reasoned opinion that it did not have sufficient information available to be able to assess whether it is the value of transport or of health services which is predominant in the contracts identified, the Commission, as the Advocate General noted at point 96 of her Opinion, deliberately refrained from addressing that aspect in the context of the present action, although the documents before the Court do not indicate that that decision was dictated by any alleged lack of cooperation on the part of the German authorities during the pre-litigation procedure.

119 In its application, the Commission stated in general terms that the value of health services may be considerable, both in contracts relating to qualified patient transport services and in those relating to emergency ambulance transport services, and that, since the contracts at issue generally cover both types of service, the respective values of those services will vary from one contract to the next, although contracts in which the value of transport services is predominant as against the value of health services and contracts in which the converse is the case are equally conceivable.

120 Having opted for an approach based on those suppositions, the Commission deliberately refrained from establishing that the contracts at issue, or at least some of them, were characterised by the predominance of the value of transport services over the value of health services.

121 On the contrary, with regard to Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, the Commission's complaints were focused on the fact that, irrespective of the legal distinction made in Article 10 of Directive 92/50 or in Article 22 of Directive 2004/18, there had been a failure when awarding each of those contracts to comply with Article 16 of Directive 92/50 or Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18 given that the results of the award of those contracts were not published, which was not denied by the Federal Republic of Germany in respect of any of the contracts referred to.

122 In such circumstances, where, in the absence of the production by the Commission of sufficiently specific evidence, it is conceivable that none of the contracts identified in the action is characterised by the predominance of the value of transport services over the value of health services, the finding of a failure to comply with Directives 92/50 and 2004/18 must be limited to an infringement of Article 10 of Directive 92/50 in conjunction with Article 16 thereof or, since 1 February 2006, of Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 in conjunction with Article 35(4) thereof, since those provisions are applicable in any event to contracts which, like those at issue in the present case, cover both transport and health services, regardless of the respective value of those services in the contract concerned.

123 As the Advocate General stated at point 93 of her Opinion, the Commission, moreover, has not sought to establish that the contracts identified in its action, or at least some of them, were characterised by the predominance of the value of health services over the value of transport services. In those circumstances, where, in the absence of sufficient specific information, it is conceivable that none of the contracts identified in the action is characterised by such predominance, the Court is not in a position to find that there has been a failure to comply with Articles 43 EC and 49 EC as alleged. The same conclusion applies as regards the question whether the contracts identified by the Commission have a certain cross-border interest.

124 The Court will also examine the merits of the arguments of the Federal Republic of Germany and of the Kingdom of the Netherlands in relation to the reasoning based on Article 86(2) EC.

– The reasoning based on Article 86(2) EC

125 In paragraphs 55 and 60 of the judgment in Ambulanz Glöckner, the Court categorised emergency transport services as services of general economic interest within the meaning of Article 86(2) EC.

126 However, it is apparent from settled case-law that it is incumbent upon a Member State which invokes Article 86(2) EC to show that all the conditions for application of that provision are fulfilled (see, in particular, Case C-159/94 Commission v France [1997] ECR I-5815, paragraph 101).

127 In the present case, the Federal Republic of Germany pointed to the need to ensure cross-subsidisation of ambulance services between profitable and less profitable geographic areas on the basis of population density. It also emphasised the importance of a service that is in close proximity to and collaborates with other services involved in emergency work, which entails having staff living in the vicinity of incidents available who can be readily mobilised in the event of an emergency or a major disaster.

128 However, such considerations could, as the Commission pointed out, justify the adoption by the contracting authority responsible of specific measures designed to ensure the provision by the other party to the contract, on economically acceptable terms, of a high-quality ambulance service that is efficient and available throughout the whole of the area concerned – inter alia by means of payment arrangements adapted to the specific nature of the area covered or by means of an obligation to have sufficient human and technical resources available on the ground.

129 By contrast, such considerations do not clarify how the obligation to ensure that the results of the award of the contract concerned are published is liable to prevent the accomplishment of that task of general economic interest.

130 It follows from this that the arguments based on Article 86(2) EC must be rejected.

131 Having regard to all of the foregoing considerations, it must be held that, by failing to publish notices of the results of the procedure for the award of contracts, the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 10 of Directive 92/50 in conjunction with Article 16 thereof or, since 1 February 2006, under Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 in conjunction with Article 35(4) thereof in relation to the award in accordance with the tender model of contracts for public emergency ambulance and qualified patient transport services in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony.

132 The application must be dismissed as to the remainder.

Costs

133 Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. Under Article 69(3) of those rules, where each party succeeds on some and fails on other heads, the Court may order that the costs be shared or that the parties bear their own costs. In the present case, since the Commission and the Federal Republic of Germany have each been unsuccessful in certain claims, they shall each bear their own costs.

134 Under the first subparagraph of Article 69(4) of the Rules of Procedure, the Member State which has intervened in the proceedings is to be ordered to bear its own costs. The Kingdom of the Netherlands shall therefore bear its own costs.

On those grounds, the Court (Third Chamber) hereby:

1. Declares that, by failing to publish notices of the results of the procedure for the award of contracts, the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under Article 10 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts, in conjunction with Article 16 thereof or, since 1 February 2006, under Article 22 of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts, in conjunction with Article 35(4) thereof in relation to the award in accordance with the tender model of contracts for public emergency ambulance and qualified patient transport services in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony;

2. Dismisses the action as to the remainder;

3. Orders the European Commission, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Kingdom of the Netherlands to bear their own costs.

I – Introduction

1. The present case originates in an action for failure to fulfil obligations brought by the Commission pursuant to Article 226 EC by which the Commission seeks a declaration from the Court of Justice that, by failing to make a public call for tenders or failing transparently to award service contracts in the field of public ambulance services in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony, and by failing to publish notices of contracts awarded, the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (2) and Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (3) and breached the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services (Articles 43 EC and 49 EC).

II – Legislative framework

A – Directive 92/50

2. Under Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50, contracting authorities must ensure that there is no discrimination between different service providers.

3. Article 10 of Directive 92/50 provides:

‘Contracts which have as their object services listed in both Annexes I A and I B shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI where the value of the services listed in Annex I A is greater than the value of the services listed in Annex I B. Where this is not the case, they shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.’

4. Article 16 of Directive 92/50 states:

‘1. Contracting authorities who have awarded a public contract or have held a design contest shall send a notice of the results of the award procedure to the Office for Official Publication of the European Communities.

2. The notices shall be published:

…’

B – Directive 2004/18

5. Under Article 2 of Directive 2004/18, contracting authorities must treat economic operators equally and non-discriminatorily and act in a transparent way.

6. Article 22 of Directive 2004/18 provides:

‘Contracts which have as their object services listed both in Annex II A and in Annex II B shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 23 to 55 where the value of the services listed in Annex II A is greater than the value of the services listed in Annex II B. In other cases, contracts shall be awarded in accordance with Article 23 and Article 35(4).’

7. Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18 states:

‘Contracting authorities which have awarded a public contract or concluded a framework agreement shall send a notice of the results of the award procedure no later than 48 days after the award of the contract or the conclusion of the framework agreement.

In the case of public contracts for services listed in Annex II B, the contracting authorities shall indicate in the notice whether they agree to its publication. For such services contracts the Commission shall draw up the rules for establishing statistical reports on the basis of such notices and for the publication of such reports in accordance with the procedure laid down in Article 77(2).

…’

III – Facts of the case

8. In the Federal Republic of Germany, the law governing ambulance services falls within the legislative competence of the Länder, which have exercised their legislative discretion in different ways.

9. In most German Länder, ambulance services are provided using a dual system which distinguishes between public ambulance services and the provision of ambulance services on the basis of authorisations granted under the regional laws on ambulance services.

10. Public ambulance services normally cover both emergency transport services and qualified patient transport services. Emergency transport consists in the conveyance, with appropriate medical care, of persons with life-threatening injuries or conditions by means of emergency doctor's car or ambulance. Qualified patient transport consists in the conveyance of persons who are ill, injured or otherwise in need of help but who are not emergency patients; they are conveyed, with appropriate medical care, by patient transport ambulance.

11. Several Länder have decided to leave it to the individual towns and cities, administrative districts, joint ambulance associations etc. to select service providers for public ambulance services. To that end, those local authorities generally conclude contracts with individual service providers for the area-wide provision of ambulance services for the public. Where the local authority pays for the services directly, the relevant contract model is known as the 'submission model'. On the other hand, where remuneration takes the form of charges levied directly by the contractor on patients or sickness funds, the 'concession model' is employed.

12. By its action, the Commission objects to the award of service contracts in the field of public ambulance services in the Länder of Lower Saxony, North Rhine-Westphalia, Saxony and Saxony-Anhalt, where the submission model is used throughout. In particular, the Commission alleges that in those Länder calls for tenders were not, as a rule, made for contracts in the field of public ambulance services which are covered by the procurement directives and that they were not awarded transparently.

IV – Pre-litigation procedure

13. After several complaints had been received by the Commission, it informed the Federal Republic of Germany by letter of 10 April 2006 that it might have infringed the procurement directives and primary law in awarding contracts for pecuniary interest in respect of ambulance services in the Länder of North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony, Saxony and Saxony-Anhalt. At the same time, the Commission informed the Federal Republic of Germany that it might have breached the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services in awarding service concessions for ambulance services. The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany was therefore invited, pursuant to Article 226 EC, to submit observations on the Commission's position within two months.

14. In its letter of 10 July 2006, the Federal Republic of Germany denied the alleged infringements of Community law. Furthermore, it claimed that in 2005 the law had been amended in Saxony, with the result that from 1 January 2009 at the latest contracts for ambulance services in Saxony would be awarded on the basis of a selection procedure having due regard to the principles of non-discriminatory competition.

15. By letter of 15 December 2006, the Commission sent the Federal Republic of Germany the reasoned opinion. In that opinion it concluded that the Federal Republic of Germany had failed to fulfil and continued to fail to fulfil its obligations under Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 and had breached the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services. The Commission therefore called on the Federal Republic of Germany to take the necessary measures to comply with the reasoned opinion within two months of receipt.

16. In its letter of 22 February 2007, the Federal Republic of Germany once again rejected the Commission's legal opinion. It claimed that there were no infringements of Community law in any of the specific cases cited by the Commission.

V – Procedure before the Court of Justice and forms of order sought

17. Because the Federal Republic of Germany failed to comply with the reasoned opinion, the Commission brought an action under Article 226 EC on 15 April 2008.

18. The Commission claims that the Court should:

– declare that, by failing to publish notices of contracts awarded and by failing to make a public call for tenders or failing transparently to award service contracts in the field of public ambulance services, the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to fulfil its obligations under

Directives 92/50/EEC and 2004/18/EC and breached the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services (Articles 43 EC and 49 EC);

– order the Federal Republic of Germany to pay the costs.

19. The Federal Republic of Germany contends that the Court should dismiss the application and order the Commission to pay the costs.

20. By order of the President of the Court of 16 December 2008, the Kingdom of the Netherlands was granted leave to intervene in support of the form of order sought by the Federal Republic of Germany. The Kingdom of the Netherlands claims, in support of the Federal Republic of Germany, that the Commission's application should be dismissed.

VI – Main submissions of the parties

21. In the view of the Commission, it has become the established practice in various German Länder, in awarding contracts in the field of public emergency and qualified patient transport services, to award contracts to local providers in contravention of procurement law without making a Europe-wide call for tenders and without ensuring proper transparency.

22. With reference to nine specific examples of contracts awarded in the Länder of Lower Saxony, North Rhine-Westphalia, Saxony and Saxony-Anhalt, the Commission stresses, first of all, that the towns and cities, administrative districts and joint ambulance associations responsible for the individual awards are to be regarded as contracting authorities within the meaning of the procurement directives. Furthermore, the contracts awarded in the field of public ambulance services are to be classified as public contracts for pecuniary interest, whose contract value in the cases in question is well above the financial thresholds which are relevant for the applicability of Directives 92/50 and 2004/18.

23. Where those public contracts were concluded before 31 January 2006, they are subject to Directive 92/50. Because those contracts relate to mixed services, they should have been awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to IV or Articles 14 and 16 of Directive 92/50, depending on whether the value of the transport services or the value of the medical services is greater. That directive contains a provision covering the contracts which were concluded after the expiry of the transposition period for Directive 2004/18.

24. Since all the examples cited concern contracts with a cross-border interest, the Federal Republic of Germany has also breached the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency contained within freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

25. In the Commission's view, the alleged infringements do not represent isolated cases, but are evidence of a general procurement practice which is contrary to Community law. The Commission believes that its view is confirmed by the extremely low number of Europe-wide calls for tenders for ambulance services and notices of contracts awarded.

26. In the view of the German Government, the Commission's attempt to obtain a comprehensive declaration that procurement practice in the Federal Republic of Germany is unlawful by making claims in relation to individual procurement procedures in four out of the sixteen Länder is not acceptable. In addition, various factual assertions made by the Commission are incorrect.

27. The German Government also relies on the exception under the first paragraph of Article 45 EC in conjunction with Article 55 EC, under which the chapters of the EC Treaty on freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services do not apply, so far as any given Member State is concerned, to activities which in that State are connected, even occasionally, with the exercise of official authority; that is the case with the contested ambulance services. Because the procurement directives have their legal basis in those two chapters of the EC Treaty, they are also not applicable in the present case.

28. In the alternative, the German Government claims that the contested ambulance services meet the conditions for preferential treatment under Article 86(2) EC. Because Article 86(2) EC contains an exception not only to the rules on competition, but also to all the other rules contained in the EC Treaty, the action brought by the Commission is also unfounded from this perspective. Lastly, the German Government refers to two orders of the Bundesgerichtshof (Federal Court of Justice) of 1 December 2008, according to which procurement law must now also apply to the award of contracts for ambulance services.

29. The Netherlands Government takes the view that the Federal Republic of Germany has infringed neither the procurement directives nor Article 43 EC and Article 49 EC. The contested public ambulance services should be regarded as services of general economic interest within the meaning of Article 86(2) EC. In this regard, it should be borne in mind that the exception under Article 86(2) EC also applies to the fundamental freedoms. Lastly, the Netherlands Government considers the possibility that the exception under Articles 45 EC and 55 EC applies. The Netherlands Government tends towards the view that the conditions governing the application of these exceptions could be met in the case of the contested ambulance services.

VII – Legal assessment

A – Admissibility

30. A particular characteristic of treaty infringement proceedings under Article 226 EC is that the definition of the subject-matter in the pre-litigation procedure delimits the admissible subject-matter of the subsequent judicial proceedings. It is settled case-law that the reasoned opinion and the subsequent action for a declaration of failure to fulfil obligations must be based on the same grounds and pleas, with the result that the Court cannot examine a ground of complaint which was not formulated in the reasoned opinion. (4)

31. This condition governing admissibility, which prohibits the grounds of complaint in the action being extended from the submissions made in the reasoned opinion, helps to protect the rights of defence of the Member State concerned, which is to be given an opportunity to comply with its obligations under Community law and to defend itself effectively against the charges formulated by the Commission. At the same time, that condition reflects the general procedural principle that any contentious procedure must have a clearly defined dispute as its subject-matter. (5)

32. In my opinion, in formulating its claims in the present case the Commission has inadmissibly gone beyond the grounds of complaint raised in the reasoned opinion. In order in clarify and define this inadmissible extension of the action, I will first examine the classification of the contested ambulance services in the system of the procurement directives. I will then explain how the Commission has reformulated its claims from the reasoned opinion in the application and the way in which that reformulation has also modified the subject-matter of the proceedings.

33. The fact that Federal Republic of Germany has not expressly raised a plea of inadmissibility against the extension of the action is not relevant, however. Because the prohibition on extending the subject-matter of the dispute constitutes an essential guarantee intended by the EC Treaty, adherence to which is an essential formal requirement of the procedure for finding that a Member State has failed to fulfil its obligations, (6) the Court may decide this of its own motion even without a complaint being raised by the Federal Republic of Germany. (7)

1. Ambulance services as mixed services in the system of the procurement directives

34. Both Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 distinguish between ‘priority’ and ‘non-priority’ services. Priority services are listed in Annex I A to Directive 92/50 and in the identical Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 and include land transport services. Non-priority services are listed in Annex I B to Directive 92/50 and in the identical Annex II B to Directive 2004/18 and include health services. The most important distinction, for the purposes of procurement law, between priority services under Annexes I A and II A and non-priority services under Annexes I B and II B is that only priority services are subject to the full application of the relevant procurement directive. (8) For non-priority services, on the other hand, it is merely provided that the rules on technical specifications apply and that contracting authorities must notify the Commission of contracts awarded. (9)

35. It is common ground in the present case that the contested ambulance services are to be classified as mixed services containing components of both priority and non-priority services. That classification follows directly from Tögel, (10) in which ambulance and patient transport services with a nurse in attendance were regarded as mixed services for the purposes of Article 10 of Directive 92/50. (11) The conveyance of persons is to be classified as a priority service and medical care during transportation as a non-priority service.

36. Under Article 10 of Directive 92/50 and under Article 22 of Directive 2004/18, mixed contracts for priority and non-priority services are subject to the full application of the relevant procurement directive where the value of the priority services is greater than the value of the non-priority services. If that is not the case, mixed contracts are to be treated as contracts for non-priority services.

2. Reformulation of the claims made in the application

37. In the reasoned opinion, the Commission expressly considered the mixed nature of the contested ambulance services both in its legal assessment and in formulating the individual grounds of complaint.

38. In the reasoned opinion, the Commission argued in particular that in the contested ambulance services the transport services within the meaning of Annex I A to Directive 92/50 and Annex II A to Directive 2004/18 predominate, with the result that, in awarding those contracts, the Federal Republic of Germany has infringed Article 10 in conjunction with Titles III to IV of Directive 92/50 and, since 1 February 2006, Article 22 in conjunction with Articles 23 to 55 of Directive 2004/18/EC. In the event that in individual cases among those cited the medical services within the meaning of Annex I B to Directive 92/50 and Annex II B to Directive 2004/18 should predominate, the Commission alleges in the alternative an infringement of Article 10 in conjunction with Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and, since 1 February 2006, Article 22 in conjunction with Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18, and in any case a breach of the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services under Article 43 EC and Article 49 EC and the principle of non-discrimination contained within those principles.

39. In its application, the Commission deliberately refrained from answering the question whether the contested ambulance services have their emphasis on the transportation of persons or on medical care. There is now no need to answer the question, according to the Commission, because in any case the contested procurement procedures infringed the rules on the duty to notify contracts awarded under Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18 and also breached the principle of non-discrimination contained within freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

40. By reformulating the claim in this way, the Commission has inadmissibly modified the subject-matter of the proceedings.

41. While in its reasoned opinion the Commission took the position that the procurement of ambulance services breached the principle of non-discrimination laid down in primary law and the requirement of transparency laid down in primary law only in cases where the aspect of medical care predominated, in its action it takes a different position, according to which regard must always be had to the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency in the award of the contested contracts. However, this must presuppose that the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency can also be directly breached in the case of procurement of ambulance services where the transport character predominates, which was not alleged either explicitly or implicitly in the reasoned opinion.

42. The extension of the subject-matter of the proceedings therefore lies in the fact that a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency, which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, is now also being alleged in connection with the award of mixed ambulance services where the transport character predominates. In this respect the present action must be declared inadmissible.

43. This conclusion cannot be affected by the fact that the duties to make calls for tender and to give notice under the procurement directives are ultimately expressions in secondary law of the principle of non-discrimination laid down in primary law and the requirement of transparency laid down in primary law, or that in its application which is now founded on primary law the Commission did not therefore go substantively beyond the grounds of complaint raised in the reasoned opinion. The crucial factor is that in its application the Commission alleges an infringement of primary law in relation to priority mixed services, even though it claimed in the reasoned opinion that those services were fully subject to the procurement directives and consequently alleged only an infringement of those directives. Therefore, in the pre-litigation procedure the Federal Republic of Germany was not able to address the question whether the award of contracts for the provision of ambulance services which have their emphasis on transport of persons and are therefore fully subject to the procurement directives may actually be assessed directly on the primary-law basis of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency. (12)

44. If this modification of the basis of the action were to be declared admissible, this would result in an unacceptable infringement of the rights of the defence enjoyed by the Federal Republic of Germany, because it would be deprived of the opportunity in the pre-litigation procedure to address the essential question of whether and to what extent the Commission was permitted to base its claims regarding the award of priority mixed services directly on primary law.

45. It should also be pointed out at this point that in its application the Commission appears in places to claim an infringement of Article 2 of Directive 2004/18 and a declaration against the Federal Republic of Germany to that effect. (13) In so far as the claims were to be interpreted in that way, that claim is also to be rejected as inadmissible because the complaint of an infringement of Article 2 of Directive 2004/18 was not expressly raised in the reasoned opinion.

3. Conclusion

46. In the light of these considerations, I conclude that the present action for failure to fulfil obligations should be dismissed as inadmissible in so far as it also alleges a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency, which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, in respect of the procurement of ambulance services where the transport character predominates.

47. Should the Court conclude that by its action the Commission is also seeking a declaration of an infringement of Article 2 of Directive 2004/18, that claim is likewise to be rejected as inadmissible.

B – Merits

48. The Federal Republic of Germany counters the action for failure to fulfil obligations brought by the Commission with three lines of argument. The German Government relies, first, on the exception under Article 45 EC and, in the alternative, on the justification under Article 86(2) EC. Second, the German Government disputes some of the factual assertions made by the Commission. Third, the German Government objects to the Commission's application for a declaration that a practice contrary to procurement law exists.

49. Against this background, I will first consider below the issue of the award of contracts for ambulance services in the light of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC in conjunction with Article 55 EC and, later, in the light of Article 86(2) EC. I will then examine in detail the nine procurement procedures to which the Commission objects. Lastly, I will address the question whether the results of that examination justify a declaration that there is a practice contrary to procurement law.

1. Non-applicability of the exception under the first paragraph of Article 45 EC

50. Under the first paragraph of Article 45 EC in conjunction with Article 55 EC, the rules of primary law on the right of establishment and on freedom to provide services do not apply, so far as any given Member State is concerned, to activities which in that State are connected, even occasionally, with the exercise of official authority. If an activity is connected with the exercise of official authority in a Member State, it is therefore excluded from the application of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

51. The same must hold for the secondary legislation adopted to implement the chapters on the right of establishment and freedom to provide services. In so far as such secondary legislation also governs an activity connected with the exercise of official authority, it must be found, by way of an interpretation of the secondary legislation in a manner in conformity with the Treaty, that those activities are excluded from the application of that legislation in the Member States concerned. (14)

52. If the emergency and patient transport services to which the contested contracts relate were connected with the exercise of official authority within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC, the breach of the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services alleged by the Commission would have to be rejected as unfounded. Because, moreover, both Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 were adopted on the basis of Article 47(2) EC and Article 55 EC and therefore pursuant to the primary-law rules on competences in the chapters on the right of establishment and on freedom to provide services, the claim that those procurement directives have been infringed would also have to be rejected as unfounded in that case.

53. However, it is unclear to me whether the operation of emergency and patient transport services may be classified as an activity within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC connected, even occasionally, with the exercise of official authority.

54. It should be pointed out, first, that the interpretation of the expression ‘exercise of official authority’ within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC falls within the scope of Community law. The Community legal order does not, in principle, aim to define concepts on the basis of one or more national legal systems unless there is express provision to that effect. (15)

55. The question whether an activity has a connection with the exercise of official authority within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC must therefore be answered on the basis of the Community-law definition of official authority under that provision.

56. A condition for assuming the existence of – a connection with – the exercise of official authority within the meaning of Article 45 EC is the power of enjoying the prerogatives outside the general law, privileges of official power and powers of coercion over citizens. (16)

57. In view of the basic importance of the fundamental freedoms for the single market, the first paragraph of Article 45 EC – if applicable, in conjunction with Article 55 EC – is to be given a narrow interpretation as an exception to the principles of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services. (17) The exception under the first paragraph of Article 45 EC is not therefore applicable to any activity in which prerogatives outside the general law, privileges of official power and powers of coercion may be enjoyed over citizens. Rather, it is necessary for such a connection with the exercise of official authority to be sufficiently intense and direct.

58. In other words, the criterion of the ‘exercise of official authority’ within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC requires a sufficiently qualified exercise of prerogatives outside the general law, privileges of official power or powers of coercion. The Court has summarised this qualitative assessment of the connection with official functions in the requirement that the application of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC – if applicable, in conjunction with Article 55 EC – requires a ‘direct’ and ‘specific’ connection with the exercise of official authority. (18)

59. Thus, in its judgment of 29 October 1998 in Commission v Spain, (19) in examining the question whether the activities of private security undertakings in Spain were connected with the exercise of official authority, the Court stressed that even where in specific situations such private security forces are called upon to assist public security forces, the functions they perform are only auxiliary functions. It follows that private security undertakings are not ‘directly and specifically’ involved in the exercise of official authority. Advocate General Alber had proposed this approach in his Opinion in that case, pointing out that the distinction between main and auxiliary functions must be understood not as a quantitative criterion, but as a qualitative one and that there is a difference of degree between the powers of the public security forces and those of the private security forces. (20)

60. Recently, the Court was similarly strict in its judgment of 22 October 2009 in Commission v Portugal, (21) in which it ruled that the activities of the private vehicle roadworthiness testing bodies did not fall within the exception provided for in Article 45 EC, even though such organisations issued certifications of the technical inspections carried out by them and also exercised official powers in this respect. However, the exercise of those official powers did not fulfil the qualitative criterion of a 'direct and specific' connection with the exercise of official authority within the meaning of Article 45 EC. In this connection, the Court pointed out that the certification drew only the legally envisaged conclusions from the relevant roadworthiness test, without the technical inspection bodies having real decision-making independence. Furthermore, the decisions whether or not to certify roadworthiness were taken in the context of direct State supervision. (22)

61. The Court had already ruled, in examining the applicability of the exception under Article 45 EC with regard to commissioners with insurance undertakings and private provident associations, that the performance of purely auxiliary and preparatory functions for an institution which actually exercises official authority by taking the final decision cannot be regarded as having a connection with the exercise of official authority within the meaning of that exception. (23)

62. In summary, it is now settled case-law that the 'exercise of official authority' within the meaning of the first paragraph of Article 45 EC is subject to high qualitative requirements, which have thus far frustrated reliance on Article 45 EC almost without exception. (24)

63. In the present case too, it would appear that the providers of emergency and patient transport services have a connection with the exercise of official authority to a limited extent, but without displaying the necessary qualitative characteristics for the application of Article 45 EC.

64. The Federal Republic of Germany considers that there are grounds for a connection with the exercise of official authority, first, because the agreements in question are to be regarded under German law as public-law agreements. Second, the Federal Republic of Germany points out the special prerogatives enjoyed by the ambulance services under the law on roads and on road transport, which consist in particular in giving instructions to other road users through the use of flashing blue lights and sirens which must be observed and with regard to which non-compliance may be penalised by a fine. Third, the Federal Republic of Germany states that the ambulance services are often involved in organising the ambulance service and in performing the official functions in the fields of fire protection and civil protection and support police security protection through the provision of emergency vehicles within the framework of public safety measures. Fourth, the Federal Republic of Germany stresses the appointment of ambulance service personnel as administrative enforcement officers which is often provided for under regional law.

65. These arguments are not convincing.

66. With its first argument, the Federal Republic of Germany disregards the principle that the Community legal order does not, in principle, aim to define concepts on the basis of one or more national legal systems. (25) The fact that under German law the contested ambulance services are to be organised on a public-law basis is irrelevant to the question whether those ambulance services fall within the scope of Article 45 EC.

67. Even though the Federal Republic of Germany then rightly takes the view that the use of flashing blue lights and sirens by the ambulance services is to be regarded as the exercise of a special prerogative, the specific expression of this special prerogative does not seem to have the intensity which, according to settled case-law, is required for the application of Article 45 EC. The special prerogatives claimed simply amount to, on the one hand, specially fitting out ambulance service vehicles and equipping them with flashing blue lights and siren and, on the other, claiming traffic priority over other road users with those vehicles under certain conditions, whereby failure by other road users to comply with those special prerogatives is punishable by a fine. In my opinion, these relatively weak special prerogatives do not meet the abovementioned high qualitative requirements for the exercise of official authority within the meaning of Article 45 EC.

68. In this connection, the involvement by the ambulance services, cited by the German Government, in organising the ambulance service and in fire protection and civil protection and in providing emergency vehicles in support of security authorities and fire services is not convincing either. It should be pointed out, first of all, that the provision of emergency vehicles in support of security authorities is generally to be regarded as a purely auxiliary and preparatory activity which cannot, according to the abovementioned case-law, have a direct connection with the exercise of official authority. Even if the examples cited by the Federal Republic of Germany of the ambulance services' involvement in organising the ambulance service and in fire and civil protection (26) went beyond purely auxiliary and preparatory activities, those activities too do not meet the abovementioned high qualitative requirements for the exercise of official authority within the meaning of Article 45 EC.

69. Lastly, the argument of the possibility, often provided for under the law of the Länder, of appointing ambulance service personnel as administrative enforcement officers cannot be accepted because it is clear from the Court's case-law that the extension of the exception allowed by Articles 45 EC and 55 EC to an entire profession is not possible when the activities connected with the exercise of official authority are separable from the professional activity in question taken as a whole. (27)

70. In the light of the foregoing, I conclude that the contested activity of providing ambulance services does not as such imply any direct and specific connection with the exercise of official authority. In the present case the exception under Article 45 EC is not therefore relevant.

2. No justification under Article 86(2) EC

71. Relying on Ambulanz Glöckner, (28) the Federal Republic of Germany claims, in the alternative, that ambulance services are to be classified as services of general economic interest within the meaning of Article 86(2) EC, the justification contained in that provision being applicable without reservation to the field of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

72. These arguments are not convincing.

73. The Federal Republic of Germany is correct in so far as it argues that in the judgments of 23 October 1997 in Commission v Netherlands (29) and of 18 June 1998 in Corsica Ferries France, (30) the Court declared the justification under Article 86(2) EC also to be applicable to State measures which were incompatible with the provisions of the EC Treaty on free movement of goods and freedom to provide services, and thereby confirmed that Article 86(2) EC may be relied on to justify infringements of Article 86(1) EC in conjunction with the fundamental freedoms. (31)

74. In the light of recent developments in the case-law of the Court of Justice, however, the question arises, first of all, whether Commission v Netherlands and Corsica Ferries France may still be applicable without reservation in this respect. According to the most recent case-law, the fact that an activity falls outside the scope of the rules on competition, having regard to its specific form, does not necessarily mean that it also falls outside the scope of the provisions on free movement. (32)

75. Against this background, the question arises whether this line of case-law following from Commission v Netherlands and Corsica Ferries France on the applicability of Article 86(2) EC in the field of the fundamental freedoms should be re-examined, especially as the Court appeared to rule out such applicability in its earlier case-law. (33)

76. Nevertheless, in the present case there is no need to consider this question any further, since the Federal Republic of Germany has not even shown that the conditions governing the application of Article 86(2) EC as such are met.

77. It is incumbent upon the Member State which invokes Article 86(2) to demonstrate that the conditions laid down in that provision are met. (34)

78. In the present case, Article 86(2) EC requires the following elements to be demonstrated: that the contested ambulance services are to be classified as services of general economic interest, that a modification of the contested procurement practice in accordance with Community law would obstruct or jeopardise the performance, in law or in fact, of those services, and that the development of trade has not been affected to such an extent as is incompatible with the interests of the Community.

79. Whilst it would appear to be common ground that emergency transport services are to be classified as services of general economic interest within the meaning of Article 86(2) EC, (35) the Federal Republic of Germany has failed to demonstrate in the present case that the contested procurement practice is absolutely necessary and that the performance of the task of providing the contested ambulance services cannot therefore be guaranteed by other means which are more commensurate with Community law.

80. In this respect, the Federal Republic of Germany merely argues that the integration of new ambulance service providers in a region's ambulance service system could hinder or prevent cross-subsidies between densely built-up areas, where the provision of ambulance services is more profitable, and a large number of less profitable areas with a low population density. In addition, it claims that the protection, inherent in current procurement practice, of membership-based assistance organisations operating in Germany is necessary because those organisations have a duty to provide assistance in the event of an emergency. Only those organisations therefore guarantee that in an emergency there can be recourse to a large number of locally based voluntary workers, and such workers must have the option to gain regular practical experience in the ambulance service.

81. In its reply, the Commission responded to the cross-subsidy argument by stating that the claim that ambulance service organisations required cross-subsidies in order to make provision for less profitable areas was not an argument against a call for tender for ambulance services in accordance with Community law. Allowances could be made for differences in profitability of certain districts by paying a higher amount for less profitable districts. Another option was the combined procurement of emergency ambulance services and patient transport services for geographically defined areas which cover both more profitable and less profitable districts.

82. In its rejoinder, the Federal Republic of Germany did not claim that, in the light of the relevant factual and legal circumstances, these procurement alternatives put forward by the Commission would hinder or even render impossible the performance of the task of providing emergency transport services. Against this background, the argument of the necessity of the contested procurement practice on account of the ensuing cross-subsidies must be rejected because it has not been sufficiently substantiated.

83. The same holds for the argument regarding the large number of local voluntary workers. In this respect, the Commission pointed out, as an alternative which is consistent with procurement law, the possibility of a call for tenders where local availability was taken into consideration as a selection criterion. The Federal Republic of Germany did not provide sufficient evidence to refute this possibility in its rejoinder either.

84. In the light of these considerations, I conclude that the Federal Republic of Germany has not provided the evidence incumbent on it that the contested procurement practice for ambulance services meets the criteria laid down in Article 86(2) EC. Its reliance on Article 86(2) EC must therefore be rejected as unfounded for that reason.

3. Analysis of the nine contested procurement procedures

85. The Commission objects to nine procurement procedures for the provision of ambulance services in four Länder. On that basis, it seeks a declaration that the procurement practice in the Federal Republic of Germany is unlawful. Because an unlawful practice can exist only in so far as Community law has actually been infringed in the implementation of the individual contested procurement procedures, I will first examine whether and to what extent infringements of the rules and principles cited by the Commission may be established in connection with the implementation of the individual procurement procedures.

a) Award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg (Saxony-Anhalt)

86. According to the Commission, the City of Magdeburg (Stadt Magdeburg), as the contracting authority, conducted a so-called 'authorisation procedure' for the award of contracts for pecuniary interest in relation to ambulance services from October 2005. The service purportedly covered the provision of vehicles and personnel for emergency ambulance services and qualified patient transport services for the period 2007 to 2011, with a contract value of more than EUR 7 000 000 per year. There was apparently no Europe-wide call for tenders.

87. This description of the facts is not disputed by the Federal Republic of Germany.

88. In the view of the Commission, this procurement procedure constitutes an infringement by the Federal Republic of Germany of Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18. Furthermore, the procurement procedure also breached the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency contained within freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

i) Infringement of Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18

89. I concur with the Commission in so far as in any case the award of the contested contracts by the City of Magdeburg infringed Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18.

90. According to the undisputed description given by the Commission, the City of Magdeburg, as the contracting authority within the meaning of the procurement directives, concluded with a service provider a written contract for pecuniary interest in respect of the provision of ambulance services, whose estimated contract value was greater than the thresholds laid down in Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18. Even though it has not been established precisely at what time certain events which are relevant for procurement law purposes took place – according to the Commission the procedure was conducted from October 2005 – and it is not therefore clear whether the award of the contested contracts is to be examined completely or partially on the basis of Directive 92/50 or completely or partially on the basis of Directive 2004/18, (36) the absence of more precise information on the chronology of the procurement procedure in the present case cannot lead to a finding that there was no infringement of procurement law. Both under Directive 92/50 and under Directive 2004/18 the City of Magdeburg was required to comply with the duty to give notice of contracts awarded (Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18), irrespective of whether the transport component or the medical care component of the ambulance services was larger.

ii) No breach of the principle of non-discrimination laid down in primary law or the requirement of transparency laid down by primary law

– Consideration of the merits on the assumption that the plea of an infringement of primary law is partially inadmissible

91. As I have already mentioned in the examination of admissibility, the present action should be dismissed as inadmissible in so far as it seeks a declaration that the award of contracts for the provision of ambulance services which have their emphasis on the transport of persons breached the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services. (37)

92. The plea of an infringement of those principles of primary law is therefore admissible only in so far as it finds fault with the procurement of ambulance services which have their emphasis on medical care.

93. For this plea – restricted in that way – to be well-founded, the Commission would have to prove first of all that the procurement procedure challenged by it concerned ambulance services which had their emphasis on medical care. However, the Commission has not made any submissions on this, let alone proven it, in the present case. Rather, in the Commission's view there is no need to answer the question whether the contested services have their emphasis on transport of persons or on medical care.

94. Because in proceedings under Article 226 EC for failure to fulfil obligations it falls to the Commission to prove the allegation that the obligation has not been fulfilled and to place before the Court the information needed to assess the case (38) and, in view of the above findings, the Commission has failed to comply with that duty to produce evidence and burden of proof, the plea of a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, in so far as it is admissible, should be rejected as unfounded.

– In the alternative: Consideration of the merits in the event that the plea of an infringement of primary law should be declared admissible in its entirety

95. If, contrary to my view, the Court were to declare as admissible in its entirety the plea of a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, the merits of that plea would also have to be considered in its entirety.

96. In that scenario, the starting point for the consideration of the merits is the finding that the Commission deliberately left open the question whether the contested ambulance services have their emphasis on transport of persons or on medical care. As a result, it is not possible to determine whether those ambulance services – as mixed services for the purposes of Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 – are subject to the full application of the procurement directives (39) and whether calls for tender should therefore have been made in compliance with the procurement procedures laid down in those directives. The Commission has attempted to circumvent this problem in its action by alleging a general breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

97. Because of this tactical decision by the Commission, however, the basic question arises in the present case whether, if the Commission establishes that a Member State's behaviour might infringe both primary law and, fully, Directives 92/50 and 2004/18, it is free to decide, in proceedings under Article 226 EC, whether to bring its claims on the basis of primary law or on the basis of the procurement directives. I will examine this question below with reference to the principle of the priority of application of secondary law and having regard to the spirit and purpose of proceedings under Article 226 EC.

98. I will then consider the strict conditions of primary law which, according to recent case-law, apply to proof of a cross-border interest in the procurement of non-priority services and examine what conclusion may be drawn from that case-law for the assessment of the present case.

Principle of the priority of application of secondary law

99. According to settled case-law, the principle of the priority of application of secondary law states that the exhaustive harmonisation of secondary law in a certain sphere at Community level means that each national measure in that sphere must be assessed in the light of the provisions of the secondary measure and not those of the EC Treaty. (40)

100. In the present case, at the level of primary law the Commission essentially alleges a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

101. It is settled case-law that the principle of equal treatment under primary law in the field of public procurement is intended to afford equality of opportunity to all tenderers when formulating their tenders, regardless of their nationality. (41) The principles of equal treatment and non-discrimination on grounds of nationality imply a duty of transparency which consists in ensuring, for the benefit of any potential tenderer, a degree of advertising sufficient to enable the award of the contract to be opened up to competition and a review of the impartiality of the procurement procedures. (42)

102. These requirements of equal treatment laid down in primary law and of the establishment of sufficient transparency have been extensively harmonised in Directive 92/50 and in Directive 2004/18 on the basis of extremely detailed rules on various duties relating to information, communication and giving notice. These duties of transparency under secondary law are characterised by detailed harmonisation, which is to be regarded as full harmonisation in relation to various points. (43)

103. In the light of the priority of application of secondary law, the question therefore arises in the present case whether the Commission can allege a breach of the principle of non-discrimination laid down in primary law and of the resulting requirement of transparency, even though the award of the contested contracts would be fully covered by the procurement directives if the transport element was predominant in value terms (44) and although the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services have been harmonised in detail and in some areas even exhaustively in those procurement directives.

104. This question has not yet been answered definitively in the Court's case-law.

105. It is clear that the priority of application of secondary law precludes reliance on justifications, established in primary law, of infringements of fundamental freedoms, in so far as the infringement concerns an area in which the justifications have been fully harmonised. (45) Conversely, a national rule whereby a Member State discharges its obligations under secondary legislation cannot be characterised as a breach of a fundamental freedom. (46) It would call into question the validity of secondary legislation if an authorisation under primary law could be played off against a prohibition under secondary law, or a requirement under secondary law against a prohibition under primary law. (47)

106. Even though it has also been confirmed in several preliminary rulings that national measures may no longer be assessed on the basis of the fundamental freedoms if and to the extent that there is exhaustive secondary legislation, (48) thus far it has largely not been clarified whether in Treaty infringement proceedings too complaints may no longer be raised directly against failure to observe the fundamental freedoms if the contested conduct at the same time constitutes or could constitute an infringement of secondary legislation by which an area coming under one of those fundamental freedoms has been fully harmonised. (49)

107. In my opinion, complaints may no longer be raised in treaty infringement proceedings directly against failure to observe the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services if the contested conduct at the same time constitutes an infringement of secondary legislation which effects full harmonisation. If, on the other hand, the Commission were given the option in such a case to raise a complaint of either a breach of the fundamental freedom or an infringement of the fully-harmonised secondary legislation, this would seriously undermine the validity of the secondary legislation.

108. The distinctive feature of fully harmonising secondary legislation is that the Member States may neither surpass nor fall short of the relevant stipulations of Community law. Against this background, the fully harmonising rules are generally very specific. If, therefore, an area which is covered by a fundamental freedom is made the subject of full secondary-law harmonisation, it is almost ruled out that primary law and secondary law will impose exactly the same obligations on the Member States. The secondary legislation elaborates and shapes the provisions on the fundamental freedoms as specific rights and duties. The stipulations of primary law, on the other hand, are much more general and can therefore, in principle, be complied with in different ways. These different depths of regulation inevitably lead to a substantive tension between primary law and fully harmonising secondary law, in particular between an 'authorisation under primary law' and a 'prohibition under secondary law' or vice versa.

109. In the abovementioned rulings on the non-applicability of justifications under primary law, if and in so far as these are subject to full harmonisation, this tension between an 'authorisation under primary law' and a 'prohibition under secondary law' is resolved in favour of the prohibition under secondary law, which is thus accorded priority of application. On the basis of the same balancing of interests, the general tension between the substantively more abstract and less shaped fundamental freedom under primary law and substantively highly specific and shaped secondary legislation which effects full harmonisation and is based on that freedom must also be eliminated in favour of that secondary legislation, (50) as the Court has now confirmed in settled case-law in the preliminary ruling procedure. (51)

110. In the light of the above considerations, if the Commission finds that a Member State's behaviour might infringe both rules of primary law and fully harmonising secondary legislation based on that primary law, it cannot simply raise a general objection of an infringement of primary law in Treaty infringement proceedings.

111. The same must be true in a case like the present one, where a complaint is raised against a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the consequent requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, even though the procurement directives might be fully applicable and precisely the requirement of transparency has been regulated in detail – and in some respects exhaustively – in those directives. On account of the extremely detailed clarification in secondary law of the transparency requirements in the procurement directives, there is a problem here too of a tension between an 'authorisation under primary law' and a 'prohibition under secondary law' and vice versa, which, in the light of the above assessment, must be eliminated in favour of the secondary legislation. (52)

112. In the light of these considerations, in a case like the present one, the Commission cannot simply raise a general objection to a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

113. This finding is confirmed on a closer examination of the spirit and purpose of treaty infringement proceedings under Article 226 EC. Those proceedings essentially have an objective function, namely the uniform enforcement and safeguarding of Community law. (53) The aim of treaty infringement proceedings under Article 226 EC is not therefore to punish a Member State. A finding that a certain procedure or state of affairs is contrary to Community law is not an end in itself, but is intended, primarily, to establish certainty as to whether and to what extent a state of affairs contrary to Community law exists. A judicial finding of a failure by a Member State to fulfil its obligations under the Treaties is also intended to make it possible to ascertain what measures are necessary from the point of view of Community law to create or restore the state of affairs consistent with Community law. (54)

114. If, in a case like the present one, a general finding were to be made that, by the award of the contested contracts, the Federal Republic of Germany has breached the principle of non-discrimination laid down in primary law and the requirement of transparency laid down in primary law, without clarifying whether the contested mixed services have their emphasis on priority service elements and whether the procurement directives are therefore fully applicable, it would not be possible subsequently to ascertain with certainty what measures were necessary from the point of view of Community law to create or restore the state of affairs consistent with Community law. If the ambulance services were fully covered by the procurement directives, compliance with the substantively less shaped and specific requirement of transparency laid down in primary law would not be sufficient to satisfy the extremely detailed stipulations of the procurement directives. (55)

115. On the basis of these considerations, I conclude that, having regard to the priority of application of secondary law and the purpose of Treaty infringement proceedings under Article 226 EC, the award of the contracts by City of Magdeburg which is contested by the Commission may not be assessed on the basis of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services.

Proof of a cross-border interest in the procurement of non-priority services

116. Purely national situations do not, in principle, fall within the scope of the fundamental freedoms. Consequently, if the Commission alleges a breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, it must prove a cross-border interest in the award of the contracts in question.

117. In its judgment in Case C-507/03 Commission v Ireland, (56) the Court stated with regard to the procurement of services under Annex I B to Directive 92/50 that such services are in principle subject to the principles of the EC Treaty in the field of freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, but that the Commission must always prove that the contract in question is of certain cross-border interest. In this connection, a mere statement by the Commission that a complaint was made to it in relation to the contract in question is not sufficient to establish that the contract was of certain cross-border interest and that there was therefore a failure to fulfil obligations. (57)

118. This strict examination of the existence of a cross-border interest in the procurement of non-priority services can be explained, at least partially, by the fact that, in the opinion of the Community legislature, contracts for services under Annex I B to Directive 92/50 and Annex II B to Directive 2004/18 are not, in the light of their specific nature, of cross-border interest. Against this background,

Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 merely impose a requirement of publicity after the fact for that category of services. (58)

119. Because in proceedings for failure to fulfil obligations it falls to the Commission to place before the Court the information needed to assess the case, it cannot circumvent the stricter requirements of primary law relating to proof of a cross-border interest which apply to the procurement of mixed services with predominantly non-priority service components by deliberately leaving open the question of the classification of the contested mixed services for the purposes of procurement law. In a case like the present one, the Commission must therefore also prove a cross-border interest in the procurement of the contested services in accordance with the strict conditions which the Court laid down with regard to non-priority services in its judgment in Case C-507/03 Commission v Ireland.

120. As proof of the existence of a cross-border interest in the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg, the Commission merely refers to a general complaint regarding the procurement of ambulance services in Germany and to the economic importance of the services in question, it being assumed that there is inevitably a keen interest from foreign service providers on account of the large volume of the contracts. These general statements by the Commission, which do not make any reference to the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg and which, moreover, are based to some extent on presumptions, do not meet the high requirements governing proof of a cross-border interest in the procurement of non-priority services.

121. In the absence of proof of the cross-border connection, the Commission's claim that the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg also breached the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services is to be rejected as unfounded.

iii) Conclusion

122. In the light of the above considerations, I conclude that in the award of the contested contracts by the City of Magdeburg, the Federal Republic of Germany has infringed Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18. In other respects, the Commission's submissions regarding the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg should be rejected as inadmissible, or at least as unfounded.

b) The cases of procurement by the City of Bonn (North Rhine-Westphalia), the municipality of Witten (North Rhine-Westphalia), the Region of Hanover (Lower Saxony) and the administrative district of Hameln-Pyrmont (Lower Saxony)

123. With regard to the contested cases of procurement by the City of Bonn (Stadt Bonn), the municipality of Witten (Stadt Witten), the Region of Hanover (Region Hannover) and the administrative district of Hameln-Pyrmont (Landkreis Hameln-Pyrmont), the Commission puts forward the following arguments.

124. In 2004 the City of Bonn, as the contracting authority, awarded a contract for ambulance services for the period from 1 January 2005 to 31 December 2008, without making a Europe-wide call for tenders. The contract concerned inter alia the operation of four ambulance stations. The value of the contract was estimated to be at least EUR 5.28 million.

125. Since 2005 at least, the municipality of Witten, as the contracting authority, has awarded contracts for ambulance services to the value of EUR 945 753 per year without making Europe-wide calls for tender. The contracts concern the operation of one ambulance station.

126. In 2004, the Region of Hanover, as the contracting authority, launched a call for tenders for the provision of ambulance services in its territory, in which only the previous providers – Arbeiter-Samariter-Bund (ASB), Deutsches Rotes Kreuz (DRK), Johanniter-Unfallhilfe (JUH) and RKT GmbH – were permitted to participate. The contract awarded related to the period from 1 January 2005 to 31 December 2009 and had a total value of approximately EUR 65 million.

127. In 1993, the administrative district of Hameln-Pyrmont awarded the district association of the DRK a contract for the provision of ambulance services in its territory. The term, which had an original duration of ten years, was not terminated, but in 2003 was renewed for a further ten years without a call for tenders. In addition, in 1999 a new ambulance station was built in the municipality of Emmerthal, with the operation of which the DRK was also entrusted without any call for tenders. The total value of these procurement procedures amounts to EUR 7.2 million per year.

128. This description of the facts is not disputed by the Federal Republic of Germany.

129. In all these cases, the Commission alleges an infringement of the rules on the notification duty for awarded contracts (Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18). The existence of those infringements is not disputed.

130. On the other hand, I do not consider the breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, which is also alleged by the Commission in all these cases, to have been proved. This plea cannot be accepted because of the same jurisprudential and evidential reservations which I have already set out in examining the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg. (59)

c) Award of contracts by the administrative district of Uelzen (Lower Saxony)

131. With regard to the award of contracts by the administrative district of Uelzen (Landkreis Uelzen), the Commission claimed that on the basis of a contract of 10 July 1984 the DRK provided ambulance services within the administrative district of Uelzen with the exception of the Bevensen-Bienenbüttel area. In 2004 material amendments were made to this contract, which should be regarded as a new contract. The award of this new contract did not comply with Article 16 of Directive 92/50. In addition, the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services were breached in connection with the award of that new contract.

132. The Federal Republic of Germany claims that the reason for the amendment of the contract was that in 1984 the administrative district of Uelzen entrusted the joint municipality of Bevensen (Samtgemeinde Bevensen) with ambulance services in the Bevensen-Bienenbüttel area. In 2002, the DRK took over the entire ambulance service of the Samtgemeinde Bevensen. This explains the contractual amendments negotiated between the administrative district of Uelzen and the DRK in 2004, which are not so material as to constitute a new procurement procedure which is relevant for the purposes of procurement law. It argues that because the award of the contested contract originated from 1984 and therefore took place before the expiry of the transposition period for Directive 92/50, the complaint of non-compliance with that directive can no longer be raised.

133. The Court has answered the question of the conditions under which amendments to an existing contract are to be regarded as a separate award of a contract for the purposes of the procurement directives in pressetext Nachrichtenagentur. (60) It stressed in particular that amendments to the provisions of a public contract during the currency of the contract constitute a new award of a contract within the meaning of Directive 92/50 when they are materially different in character from the original contract and therefore such as to demonstrate the intention of the parties to renegotiate the essential terms of that contract. (61) An amendment may be regarded as being material inter alia when it extends the scope of the contract considerably to encompass services not initially covered. (62)

134. It is clear from the documents submitted by the German Government and from its observations that in 2004 the public contract was extended to include the provision of public ambulance services in the area of the Bevensen ambulance station, which accounts for around one quarter of the total area of the administrative district. Furthermore, the Federal Republic of Germany acknowledges that the value of the contract for the entire administrative district of Uelzen amounts to around EUR 4 450 000 per year and that the value of the ambulance services to be provided in the area of operation of Bevensen ambulance station amounts to at least EUR 670 000 per year. (63)

135. The contractual amendments negotiated between the Administrative District of Uelzen and the DRK in 2004 have therefore meant that the contract for the provision of ambulance services has been extended to an additional area in the administrative district, as a result of which the total area of operation increased by around 25% and the total value of the contract rose by at least 15%. The amendments to the contract negotiated in 2004 are therefore to be regarded as material, with the result that this process is to be seen as a new award of public ambulance contracts in the entire administrative district which was subject to Directive 92/50. This assessment is not affected by the – undocumented – information provided by the Federal Republic of Germany regarding the takeover of the ambulance service operated by another service provider.

136. It is not disputed in this connection that the new award of the contract in 2004 did not comply with Article 16 of Directive 92/50. An infringement of that provision by the Federal Republic of Germany has therefore been proved in the present case.

137. On the other hand, I do not consider the breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, which is also alleged by the Commission, to have been proved. This plea cannot be accepted because of the same jurisprudential and evidential reservations which I have already set out in examining the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg. (64)

d) The cases of the award of contracts by the Westsachsen (Saxony), Chemnitz/Stollberg (Saxony) and Vogtland (Saxony) joint ambulance associations

138. With regard to the contested cases of the award of contracts by the Westsachsen, Chemnitz/Stollberg and Vogtland joint ambulance associations, the Commission makes the following submissions.

139. The Westsachsen joint ambulance association, as the contracting authority, concluded with ASB, the DRK, JUH and Zwickau fire service contracts for the provision of ambulance services each with a duration of four years and a total contract value of EUR 7.9 million per year. In 2003 those contracts were renewed for four years without making a call for tenders. Upon their expiry, those contracts were renewed until 31 December 2008.

140. The Chemnitz/Stollberg joint ambulance association, as the contracting authority, concluded with ASB, the DRK, JUH and Chemnitz fire service contracts for the provision of ambulance services each with a duration of four years and a total contract value of EUR 3.3 million per year. In 2002 those contracts were renewed for four years without making a call for tenders. Upon their expiry, those contracts were renewed until 31 December 2008.

141. In 2002 and 2004, the Vogtland joint ambulance association, as the contracting authority, concluded with ASB, the DRK, JUH, a Plauen private ambulance company and Plauen fire service contracts for the provision of ambulance services each with a duration of four years and a total contract value of EUR 3.9 million per year, without making a call for tenders. Those contracts had a duration of four years and upon their expiry were renewed, without making a call for tenders, until 31 December 2008.

142. In all these cases, the Commission alleges an infringement of the rules on the notification duty for awarded contracts (Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18). Those infringements do exist.

143. This finding is not precluded by the arguments put forward by the Federal Republic of Germany to the effect that, since the entry into force in Saxony of the Gesetz über den Brandschutz, Rettungsdienst und Katastrophenschutz (Law on fire protection, ambulance services and civil protection) of 1 January 2005, the award of a contract in the field of ambulance services must be preceded by a selection procedure. In particular, the Federal Republic of Germany has not refuted the Commission's finding that in all the contested cases the award of the contracts was renewed under the old rules up to 31 December 2008.

144. It is settled case-law that the question whether there has been a failure to fulfil obligations must be examined on the basis of the position in which the Member State found itself at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. (65) The position on 16 February 2007 is therefore relevant in the present case. At that time, the alleged infringement of the procurement directives did exist.

145. On the other hand, I do not consider the breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services, which is also alleged by the Commission in all these cases, to have been proved. This plea cannot be accepted because of the same jurisprudential and evidential reservations which I have already set out in examining the award of contracts by the City of Magdeburg. (66)

e) Conclusion

146. In the light of my above considerations, I conclude that in the contested cases of the award of contracts by the 'Cities of Magdeburg and Bonn, the municipality of Witten, the Region of Hanover, the administrative districts of Uelzen and Hameln-Pyrmont and the Westsachsen, Chemnitz/Stollberg and Vogtland joint ambulance associations there is an infringement by the Federal Republic of Germany of Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18. On the other hand, a further-reaching breach of the principle of non-discrimination and the requirement of transparency which stem from freedom of establishment and freedom to provide services has not been proved by the Commission.

4. Unlawful procurement practice in the Federal Republic of Germany

147. In the present case, the Commission claims that the procurement procedures with which it finds fault indicate the existence of a consistent and general procurement practice. Against this background, it seeks a declaration that the Federal Republic of Germany has infringed Community law on account of unlawful procurement practice.

148. If the existence of a practice in a Member State which is contrary to procurement law is proven, a complaint may be raised against that practice as such in proceedings under Article 226 EC. (67) In this connection, in a first phase the Commission must make detailed allegations of repeated failures to comply which indicate the existence of a practice. It is then for the Member State concerned to refute specifically the alleged infringements. In a second phase, it must be ascertained whether the proven infringements may be regarded as sufficiently documented and detailed proof of the existence of the alleged practice. (68)

149. In the present case, the Commission has proved that, in awarding contracts for ambulance services, the City of Magdeburg (Saxony-Anhalt), the City of Bonn (North Rhine-Westphalia), the municipality of Witten (North Rhine-Westphalia), the Region of Hanover (Lower Saxony), the administrative district of Uelzen (Lower Saxony), the administrative district of Pyrmont-Hameln (Lower Saxony) and the Westsachsen (Saxony), Chemnitz/Stollberg (Saxony) and Vogtland (Saxony) joint ambulance associations have failed to comply with the rules on the notification duty under Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18.

150. Furthermore, the Commission has argued that its research reveals that in the period from 2001 to 2006, in the entire Federal Republic of Germany, only two notices of contracts awarded were published. The Federal Republic of Germany has not disputed this factual finding.

151. On the basis of the foregoing, it can therefore be stated that in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony there exists a consistent and general procurement practice for ambulance services which fails to comply with the rules on the notification duty under Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18.

152. The finding of such a practice in those Länder, in contravention of procurement law, is also not precluded by the argument put forward by the Federal Republic of Germany that in the light of two orders of the Bundesgerichtshof of 1 December 2008 (69) the Länder must review their existing procedures for the procurement of ambulance services and reorganise them having due regard to procurement law.

153. As I have already discussed, it is settled case-law that the question whether there has been a failure to fulfil obligations must be examined on the basis of the position in which the Member State found itself at the end of the period laid down in the reasoned opinion. (70) The position on 16 February 2007 is therefore relevant in the present case. At that time, the alleged infringement of the procurement directives did exist.

154. For the same reason, the arguments put forward by the Federal Republic of Germany regarding the modification of the legal position in the Land of Saxony, whereby the submission model was abandoned as from 1 January 2009, have no further relevance in the present case.

155. However, it is disputed whether the Commission found fault only with the procurement practice in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony or whether it put forward the procurement practice in those four Länder as an example of a consistent and general procurement practice in all the Länder.

156. The Commission's submissions in this respect are contradictory in so far as in its application it expressly stated that the present action was confined to the procurement practice in Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony, even though the contested procurement practice could also be found in other German Länder. (71) In its reply, however, the Commission sought a declaration that that practice is contrary to procurement law for the entire territory of the Federal Republic of Germany. (72)

157. In this connection it should be borne in mind that new pleas in law introduced in the course of proceedings are inadmissible in principle. (73) Against this background, it must be assumed in the present case that the Commission is making the geographically limited claim contained in the application, by which it raises complaints only against the contested procurement practice in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony.

158. In the light of the above considerations, I therefore conclude that in awarding contracts for pecuniary interest in respect of the provision of ambulance services in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony, the Federal Republic of Germany has infringed, up to 31 January 2006, Article 10 in conjunction with Article 16 of Council Directive 92/50 and, since 1 February 2006, Article 22 in conjunction with Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18.

VIII – Costs

159. Under Article 69(2) of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party is to be ordered to pay the costs if they have been applied for in the successful party's pleadings. However, under the first subparagraph of Article 69(3) of the Rules of Procedure, the Court may order the parties to bear their own costs where each party succeeds on some and fails on other heads, or where the circumstances are exceptional.

160. In this case, the Commission's action has been only partially successful, and I therefore suggest that the Court should order that the Commission and the Federal Republic of Germany bear their own costs.

IX – Conclusion

161. In the light of all the foregoing considerations, I suggest that the Court should:

(1) declare that, in awarding contracts for pecuniary interest in respect of the provision of ambulance services in the Länder of Saxony-Anhalt, North Rhine-Westphalia, Lower Saxony and Saxony, the Federal Republic of Germany has infringed, up to 31 January 2006, Article 10 in conjunction with Article 16 of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts and, since 1 February 2006, Article 22 in conjunction with Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts;

(2) dismiss the remainder of the action;

(3) order the Commission and the Federal Republic of Germany to bear their own costs.

Medical care comes under the subject ‘health services’ within the meaning of Annex I B, Category 25 of Directive 92/50 and Annex II B, Category 25 of Directive 2004/18.

12 – In this connection, the question arises in particular whether an examination of the award of the contested contracts on the basis of the principle of non-discrimination laid down in primary law and the requirement of transparency laid down in primary law is compatible with the principle of the priority of application of secondary law and with the spirit and purpose of Treaty infringement proceedings under Article 226 EC. See point 95 et seq. of this Opinion.

13 – Under the heading ‘The infringement of Article 16 of Directive 92/50/EEC and Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18/EC’ the Commission states, in point 39 of its application of 15 April 2008, that Articles 14 and 16 of Directive 92/50 and Articles 23 and 35(4) of Directive 2004/18 are applicable at any rate in the present case. In point 40, it then alleges an infringement of Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and of Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18. In point 41, the Commission states that Article 3(2) of Directive 92/50 and Article 2 of Directive 2004/18 are likewise applicable in the present case, but without expressly claiming an infringement of those provisions or putting forward further arguments on those two articles. In the summary of its claims in point 72, however, the Commission alleges an infringement of Article 10 in conjunction with Article 16 of Directive 92/50 and of Articles 2 and 22 in conjunction with Article 35(4) of Directive 2004/18.

43 – It must be assumed in general that Directive 92/50 and Directive 2004/18 were not as such intended to harmonise fully the award of public contracts which fall within their respective scopes. This is clear from the titles of those directives, which mention the 'coordination' of procedures for the award of contracts. The fact that those directives sought minimum harmonisation does not, however, rule out exhaustive harmonisation in certain areas. In view of the extremely detailed rules which those directives contain with regard to the duties relating to information, communication and giving notice in the individual procurement procedures, it is extremely difficult in this area to distinguish between – very detailed – minimum harmonisation and exhaustive full harmonisation. As Advocate General Mazák rightly stated in his Opinion of 22 September 2009 in Case C-299/08 Commission v France (point 12 et seq.) and the Court confirmed in its judgment of 10 December 2009 in Case C-299/08 Commission v France [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 28 et seq., the individual procurement procedures referred to in Article 28 et seq. of Directive 2004/18 are to be regarded as exhaustive. It follows directly that at least some of these provisions concerning those procedures are to be regarded as an expression of full harmonisation.

44 – If, on the other hand, the Commission had proved that the ambulance services should be treated as contracts for non-priority services and were therefore only partially covered by the procurement directives, according to consistent case-law it would be possible – if there were a clear cross-border interest – that the principles under Articles 43 EC and 49 EC would apply. ---

49 – For a restriction of the scope of the fundamental freedoms by fully harmonising secondary legislation, see Kingreen, T., Kommentar zu EUV/EGV (ed. Calliess, C./Ruffert, M.), 3rd edition, 2007, Articles 28-30 EC, section 18.

50 – Even though in Danske Slagterier, cited in footnote 45, paragraph 18 et seq., the possibility of the public relying on free movement of goods despite the existence of two harmonising directives was confirmed, in that judgment the Court did not rule against the priority of application of secondary law in the sense suggested here. As I stated in my Opinion of 4 September 2008 in that case (point 82), there is nothing to suggest that the Community legislature in adopting the directives intended also to elaborate the rights of citizens of the Union and thus remove the possibility for them to rely on the right to the free movement of goods established by Article 28 EC.

51 – See the judgments cited in footnote 48.

---

52 – It should be born in mind in this connection that in the case of minimum harmonisation the minimum standards to be achieved by the Member States are established. If such minimum standards lay down strict rules on procedures and time-limits which must be observed in order to safeguard the requirements of equal treatment and transparency, a tension may arise with the requirements of primary law which is no less marked than in the case of full harmonisation.

---

53 – Gaitanides, C., in: von der Groeben, H., Schwarze, J. (ed.), Kommentar zum Vertrag über die Europäische Union und zur Gründung der Europäischen Gemeinschaft, 6th edition, Baden-Baden 2003, Article 226 EC, section 2. See also Rengeling, H.W./Middeke, A./Gellermann, M., Handbuch des Rechtsschutzes in der Europäischen Union, 2nd edition, Munich 2003, § 6 paragraph 2.

---

54 – See Gaitanides, C., loc. cit. (footnote 53), paragraph 12, according to whom proceedings under Article 226 EC relate neither to the liability of the Member States for the purposes of general international law nor to a condemnation, but an objective finding of a state of affairs. The proceedings have a purely organisational function and have the sole purpose of compelling the Member States to rectify current Treaty infringements. The holding up to obloquy of the infringing State may possibly be a side-effect, but is never the aim of the proceedings.

---

55 – Thus, it is settled case-law that the obligation of transparency requires the authority to ensure, for the benefit of any potential contractor, a sufficient degree of advertising, but does not necessarily imply an obligation to launch an invitation to tender; see Case C-324/07 Coditel Brabant [2008] ECR I-8457, paragraph 25, and Coname, cited in footnote 42, paragraph 21. In this connection, Egger, A., loc. cit. (footnote 36), paragraph 147 et seq., points out that the requirements of primary law allow the Member States a broader margin of discretion than the procurement directives. He rightly points out that not only does a different intensity of examination apply, but also the requirements of primary law are more general and therefore by and large less strict and detailed. See I.J. van den Berge, 'De reikwijdte van het transparantiebeginsel bij de verlening van dienstenconcessies', NTER 2005, p. 241, 243, in whose view Articles 28 EC, 43 EC and 49 EC do not really allow generally applicable statements to be made regarding the duties of transparency to be observed.

Judgment

1 These references for a preliminary ruling concern the interpretation of the relevant provisions, in the light of the facts of the disputes in the main proceedings, of Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1) and Council Directive 89/665/EEC of 21 December 1989 on the coordination of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions relating to the application of review procedures to the award of public supply and public works contracts (OJ 1989 L 395, p. 33), as amended by Directive 92/50 (‘Directive 89/665’), and general principles of European Union law on public contracts and, in particular, the principle of effective judicial protection.

2 The references have been made in proceedings between private undertakings and natural persons and Ethniko Simvoulio Radiotileorasis (National Radio and Television Council; ‘ESR’), an authority which, in accordance with national legislation, has the power and the obligation to check whether persons having the status of owner, partner, main shareholder, member of an administrative organ or management executive of an undertaking tendering in a public procurement procedure present certain aspects of incompatibility as provided for in that legislation and, therefore, must automatically be excluded from the procedure.

Legal context

European Union legislation

3 Pursuant to Article 1(a) of Directive 92/50:

‘[P]ublic service contracts shall mean contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority …

4 Article 2 thereof provides:

‘If a public contract is intended to cover both products within the meaning of [Council] Directive 77/62/EEC [of 21 December 1976 coordinating procedures for the award of public supply contracts (OJ 1977 L 13, p. 1)] and services within the meaning of Annexes I A and I B to this Directive, it shall fall within the scope of this Directive if the value of the services in question exceeds that of the products covered by the contract.’

5 Article 3 of that directive provides:

‘1. In awarding public service contracts or in organising design contests, contracting authorities shall apply procedures adapted to the provisions of this Directive.

2. Contracting authorities shall ensure that there is no discrimination between different service providers.

6 Under Article 8 of Directive 92/50:

‘Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I A shall be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI.’

7 Article 9 of that directive provides:

‘Contracts which have as their object services listed in Annex I B shall be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.’

8 Article 14 forms part of Title IV of that directive, which concerns the common rules in the technical field and deals with the technical specifications which are to be given in the general documents or the contractual documents relating to each contract, and Article 16 forms part of Title V, which governs the common advertising rules.

9 Annex IB to Directive 92/50, entitled ‘Services within the meaning of Article 9’, includes:

17 Hotel and restaurant services

26 Recreational, cultural and sporting services

27 Other services’.

10 Finally, Article 26(1) of that directive provides:

‘Tenders may be submitted by groups of service providers. These groups may not be required to assume a specific legal form in order to submit the tender; however, the group selected may be required to do so when it has been awarded the contract.’

11 Article 1 of Directive 89/665 provides:

‘1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of [Council] Directives 71/305/EEC [of 26 July 1971 concerning the co-ordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ, English Special Edition 1971 (II), p. 682)], 77/62 … and 92/50 …, decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or nation rules implementing that law.

2. Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings claiming injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.'

12 Under Article 2 of that directive:

'1. The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.

5. The Member States may provide that where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision was taken unlawfully, the contested decision must first be set aside by a body having the necessary powers.

6. The effects of the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 1 on a contract concluded subsequent to its award shall be determined by national law.

Furthermore, except where a decision must be set aside prior to the award of damages, a Member State may provide that, after the conclusion of a contract following its award, the powers of the body responsible for the review procedures shall be limited to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement.

National legislation

13 Directive 89/665 was transposed into Greek law by Law 2522/1997 providing judicial protection during the phase preceding the award of public supply, public works and public services contracts (FEK A' 178).

14 Article 2 of that Law, entitled 'Extent of judicial protection', provides:

'1. Every person concerned who has or had an interest in being awarded a particular public works, supply or services contract and has suffered or may suffer damage through the infringement of Community or domestic legislation shall be entitled to seek, as more specifically laid down in the following articles, interim judicial protection, the annulment, or a finding of invalidity, of the unlawful act of the contracting authority and the award of damages.

15 Article 4 of that Law, entitled ‘Annulment or a finding of invalidity’, provides:

‘1. The person concerned shall be entitled to seek the annulment, or a finding of invalidity, of every act or omission of the contracting authority which infringes a rule of Community or domestic law on the procedure that precedes the award of the contract. …

2. If the court declares an act or omission of the contracting authority void after the contract is awarded, and unless the award procedure has been suspended as a measure of interim relief, the contract itself is not affected. In that case the applicant may seek damages in accordance with the provisions of the following article.’

16 Article 5 of Law 2522/1997, entitled ‘Claim for damages’, provides:

‘1. A person concerned who has been excluded from participation or from the award of public works, supplies or services, in breach of a rule of Community or domestic law, shall be entitled to claim damages from the contracting authority, pursuant to Articles 197 and 198 of the Civil Code. Any provision that excludes or restricts that claim shall be inapplicable.

2. In order for damages to be awarded, it is necessary that the unlawful act or omission first be annulled, or found invalid, by the court having jurisdiction. An action for a finding of invalidity and an action for damages may be combined in accordance with the generally applicable rules.’

17 Articles 197 and 198 of the Civil Code, to which the abovementioned provision refers, provide for liability ‘arising from negotiations’, that is to say the obligation to pay damages in the event that the parties incur unwarranted expense in the course of a procedure with a view to conclusion of a contract.

18 Presidential Decree 18/1989 codifies the laws relating to the Simvoulio tis Epikratias (FEK A’ 8). Article 47 thereof, entitled ‘Legitimate interest’, provides:

‘1. An individual or a legal person who is affected by an administrative act, or whose legitimate interests, including non-financial interests, are affected by that act, has the right to bring an action for annulment.

…’

19 Law 2206/1994 governs the ‘Creation, organisation, operation, control of casinos, etc.’ (FEK A’ 62). Under Article 1(7) of that Law, entitled ‘Grant of casino licences’:

‘Casino licences are to be granted by decision of the Minister for Tourism following a public international tendering procedure organised by a seven-member commission.’

20 Article 3 of that Law, entitled ‘Operation of casinos’, provides:

‘Casinos are subject to State control.

21 Article 14(9) of the Greek Constitution and Implementing Law 3021/2002 (FEK A’ 143) institute a system of restrictions applicable to the conclusion of public contracts with persons who are active or who have holdings in the media sector. That system establishes a presumption that the status of owner, partner, main shareholder or management executive of an undertaking active in the media sector is incompatible with that of owner, partner, main shareholder or management executive of an undertaking which contracts with the State or a legal person in the public sector in the broad sense to perform a works, supply or services contract. That incompatibility also extends to natural persons who are related to a certain degree.

22 Law 3021/2002 provides, in essence, that, before issuing acceptance of a tender for or awarding a public contract and, in any event, before the public contract is signed, the contracting authority must apply to ESR for a certificate attesting that the conditions of incompatibility laid down in that law are not fulfilled. The decision of ESR is binding on the contracting authority, but may be subject to an action for annulment by persons having locus standi, including public authorities.

23 In its judgment in Case C-213/07 Michaniki [2008] ECR I-9999, paragraphs 1 and 2 of the operative part, the Court held that, although European Union law does not preclude legislation which pursues the legitimate objectives of equal treatment of tenderers and of transparency in procedures for the award of public contracts, it does preclude, from the point of view of the principle of proportionality, the setting up of an irrebuttable presumption of incompatibility such as that laid down in the national legislation at issue.

The actions in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

Case C-145/08

24 It is apparent from the order for reference that, by decision of 10 October 2001, the competent interministerial committee decided to privatise Elliniko Kazino Parnithas AE (‘EKP’), a subsidiary of Ellinika Touristika Akinita AE (‘ETA’), an undertaking wholly owned by the Greek State. The contract notice published in October 2001 provided for an initial preselection stage to determine which tenderers met the conditions set out in that notice. The highest bidder, which would be invited to sign the contract, was to be selected at a subsequent stage. In the course of the first stage, the Koinopraxia Kazino Attikis consortium and the Hyatt Regency Xenodokhiaki kai Touristiki (Ellas) AE – Elliniki Tekhnodomiki AE consortium were preselected.

25 Following an additional notice published in April 2002, the terms of the contract to be signed were settled as follows:

The contract is a mixed contract and includes:

– an agreement under which ETA would sell 49% of the shares in EKP to a ‘single purpose limited company’ (‘AEAS’), to be set up by the successful tenderer;

– an agreement under which AEAS would undertake to implement a development plan, to be completed within 750 days of obtaining the necessary planning permission. That development plan was to comprise refurbishing the casino and enhancing the facilities offered by its operating licence, refurbishing and improving two adjoining hotel units and developing stretches of surrounding land of a surface area of approximately 280 hectares. Performance of that work constitutes part of the price payable for the acquisition of 49% of the shares in EKP;

– an agreement between ETA and AEAS under which the latter would acquire the right to appoint the majority of EKP’s board of directors and thus to administer the company in accordance with the terms of the contract;

– an agreement under which AEAS would take over management of the casino business, in return for payment, which will be paid by ETA. As that remuneration, AEAS would receive a sum no greater than a scaled percentage of the annual operating profits (decreasing from 20% of profits up to EUR 30 million to 5% of profits over EUR 90 million) and 2% of turnover;

– as manager, AEAS would manage the casino business in such a way as constantly to maintain a luxurious environment offering high-level services and in a manner profitable for EKP. In concrete terms, the management profit before tax should not be less than a total of EUR 105 million for the first five financial years following entry into force of the contract. The net profit was to be shared between ETA and AEAS according to the percentage of the capital in EKP they each hold;

– Since EKP is the only casino business currently operating in the province of Attica, the contract provides that, in the event that another casino were lawfully established within that geographical area within 10 years from the date of entry into force of the contract, it would have to compensate

AEAS by paying, as damages, a sum equal to 70% of the price of the transaction. The amount of the compensation would be reduced by one tenth each year with effect from the entry into force of the contract; – with regard to management of the casino business, the contract would terminate at the end of the 10th year from taking effect.

26 Since the Hyatt Regency Xenodokhiaki kai Touristiki (Ellas) AE – Elliniki Tekhnodomiki AE consortium was the highest bidder in the procedure in question, it was designated the successful tenderer. Before signature of the contract, ETA informed ESR of the identity of the owners, partners, major shareholders and management executives of the successful tenderer in order to obtain a certificate that none of them fell within one of the cases of incompatibility as provided for in Article 3 of Law 3021/2002. By certificate issued on 27 September 2002, ESR confirmed that none of those persons fell within such a case of incompatibility.

27 That act of the ESR constitutes the subject-matter of an action for annulment brought by only three of the seven members comprising the consortium ‘Koinopraxia Kazino Attikis’, which was not awarded the contract. The applicants have submitted that a member of the consortium to which the contract was awarded fell within one of the cases of incompatibility laid down in the national legislation and that, accordingly, the award of the contract should be annulled.

28 The national court points out that the contract at issue is a mixed contract, containing, on the one hand, one aspect relating to the sale of shares by ETA to the highest bidding tenderer, which aspect, as such, is not covered by the European Union rules on public contracts, and, on the other, one aspect relating to a service contract to be concluded with the highest bidding tenderer, which assumes the obligations of managing the casino business. The aspect which concerns the transfer of shares is, according to the national court, the most important of the mixed contract. In addition, that contract also includes an aspect relating to a works contract, since the successful tenderer assumes the obligation of performing the works referred to in the order for reference, for the transferred shares as part payment. The national court notes that that aspect is entirely ancillary to the ‘services’ aspect of the contract.

29 In that context, the national court asks whether the view can be taken that the ‘services’ aspect of the contract at issue constitutes a public service concession contract, which is not subject to the European Union rules. In that regard, it is necessary to ascertain to what extent the successful tenderer bears the risks of organising and operating the services in question, having regard also to the fact that those services relate to activities which, in accordance with the national rules by which they are governed, can be subject to exclusive and special rights.

30 In the event that the Court were to hold that the part of the disputed contract concerning the management of the casino constitutes a public service contract, the national court asks whether an action for annulment brought at national level is covered by the guarantees provided for in Directive 89/665, having regard to the fact that the main object of the contract, that is to say, the sale of shares in EKP, does not fall within the scope of Community rules on public contracts and that contracts having such services as their objects, which fall within Annex I B to Directive 92/50, must be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16 of that directive, which solely include obligations of a procedural nature. Nevertheless, the national court asks whether, despite that restricted aspect of the obligations, the principle of equal treatment of participants in a contract award procedure, the safeguarding of which is the objective of Directive 89/665, also applies in such cases.

31 If the Court were to consider that an action for annulment such as that in the main proceedings does fall within the scope of Directive 89/665, the national court asks whether European Union law precludes a national procedural rule, such as that in Article 47(1) of Presidential Decree 18/1989, as interpreted by that court, under which those who participate in a public procurement procedure as a consortium can bring an action for annulment against acts in the context of that procedure only together and jointly, failing which the action is dismissed as inadmissible.

32 The national court refers in that regard to the judgment of the Court in Case C-129/04 Espace Trianon and Sofibail [2005] ECR I-7805, paragraph 22, pursuant to which a national procedural rule which requires an action for annulment of a contracting authority’s decision awarding a public contract to be brought by all the members of a tendering consortium does not limit the availability of such an action in a way contrary to Article 1(3) of Directive 89/665.

33 The national court asks, however, whether that conclusion which, in that judgment, concerned an action for annulment against the decision of a contracting authority to award a public contract, is also valid in respect of all forms of judicial protection guaranteed by the directive, in particular of claims for damages. That issue is connected with the fact that, in the present case, the national legislature, exercising the power conferred on the Member States by Article 5(2) of Directive 89/665, by adopting Article 5(2) of Law 2522/1997, made the award of damages subject to the prior annulment of the allegedly unlawful act.

34 The combination of that provision with the procedural rule in Article 47(1) of Presidential Decree 18/1989, as interpreted by the national court, makes it impossible for any individual member of a consortium which unsuccessfully participated in a contract award procedure not only to seek annulment of the act adversely affecting them jointly but also to apply to the competent court to obtain compensation for any damage they have suffered individually. In the present case, the competent court in respect of actions for annulment is the Simvoulio tis Epikratias (Council of State), while in respect of damages, a different court has jurisdiction.

35 In that context, the national court points out that whether each member of a consortium can apply to the competent court for damages therefore depends on whether all other members of the consortium wish to bring an action for annulment, when the loss suffered by the members of the consortium individually as a result of its failure to win the contract may differ in accordance with the degree to which the members incurred expenses for the purposes of participating in that contract. Consequently, the interest of each member of the consortium in seeking annulment of a decision can also be different. Thus, it is permissible to ask whether, in such a procedural context, the principle of effective judicial protection laid down by Directive 89/665 is upheld.

36 The national court notes finally that, in accordance with the national procedural rules concerning the general right to compensation for losses caused by unlawful acts of the State or public legal persons, it is the court having jurisdiction for the award of damages which also reviews, as an incidental matter, the legality of the administrative act, and not a different court as is the case of actions for annulment brought in respect of public procurement procedures. It therefore asks whether the procedures intended to ensure that rights derived from European Union law are upheld are less favourable than those which ensure that similar or analogous rights derived from national law are upheld.

37 Lastly, the national court states that its current interpretation of Article 47(1) of Presidential Decree 18/1989, that only all members of a consortium, acting jointly, have locus standi to seek annulment of an act forming part of a procedure for the award of a public contract, constitutes a reversal of its settled case-law, in accordance with which the members could bring individual actions.

38 In parallel, it points out the particular context of the main proceedings, that is to say that, initially, the action at issue was brought by the consortium as a whole and by its seven members before the Fourth Chamber of the Simvoulio tis Epikratias. That Chamber declared the action inadmissible with regard to the consortium and four of its members on the ground that they had not properly authorised their lawyer to act and, with regard to the three remaining members of the consortium, it referred the case, in the light of its importance, to the full court. Thus, the Fourth Chamber applied the case-law still valid at that time, in accordance with which an action brought by some members of a consortium was also admissible.

39 Nevertheless, the decision on inadmissibility made by the Fourth Chamber with regard to the action brought by the consortium as a whole and by four of its members was definitive, such that there is no remedy available from the proceedings pending before the full court of the national court. That court therefore asks whether that reversal of its case-law is compatible with the principle of a right to a fair hearing, which is a general principle of European Union law and also set out in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, signed in Rome on 4 November 1950 (‘ECHR’), and with the principle of protection of legitimate expectations.

40 Having regard to the foregoing considerations, the Simvoulio tis Epikratias, sitting as a full court, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

‘1. Does a contract by which the contracting authority entrusts to the contracting undertaking the management of a casino business and the execution of a development plan consisting in the upgrading of the casino premises and the commercial exploitation of the possibilities offered by the casino’s licence, and which contains a term under which the contracting authority is obliged to pay the contracting undertaking compensation should another casino lawfully operate in the wider area in which the casino in question operates, constitute a concession, not governed by … Directive 92/50 …?

2. If the first question is answered in the negative, does a legal action which is brought by persons who have participated in the procedure for the award of a public contract of mixed form providing inter alia for the supply of services subject to Annex I B to … [Directive 92/50] …, and in which they plead breach of the principle of equal treatment of participants in tender procedures (a principle affirmed by Article 3(2) of that directive), fall within the field of application of … [Directive 89/665] …, or is its application precluded inasmuch as, in accordance with Article 9 of … [Directive 92/50], only Articles 14 and 16 of the latter apply to the procedure for the award of the abovementioned contract for the supply of services?

3. If the second question is answered in the affirmative, accepting that a national provision in accordance with which only all the members of a consortium without legal personality which has participated unsuccessfully in a public procurement procedure can bring a legal action against the act awarding the contract, and not consortium members individually, is not in principle contrary to Community law and specifically to … [Directive 89/665] …, and that that still applies where the legal action has initially been brought by all the members of the consortium jointly but ultimately proves, as regards some of them, to be inadmissible, is it in addition necessary, from the viewpoint of application of that directive, to examine, in order to make a declaration of inadmissibility, whether those individual members thereafter retain the right to claim before another national court any damages which may be envisaged by a provision of national law?

4. When it has been held by settled case-law of a national court that an individual member of a consortium may also bring an admissible legal action against an act falling within a public procurement procedure, is it compatible with … [Directive 89/665] …, interpreted in the light of Article 6 of the [ECHR] as a general principle of Community law, to dismiss a legal action as inadmissible, because of a change to that settled case-law, without the person who has brought that legal action first being given either the opportunity to cure the inadmissibility or, in any event, the opportunity to set out, pursuant to the adversarial principle, his views relating to that issue?’

41 The city of Thessaloniki decided to organise a public procurement procedure for the award of a contract entitled ‘Construction of Thessaloniki town hall and an underground car park’. By decision of the municipal committee of 1 July 2004, the contract was awarded to the consortium of Aktor ATE, Themeliodomi AE and Domotekhniki AE. With a view to conclusion of the contract, the contracting authority informed ESR, in accordance with the national legislation in force, of the identity of the persons having the status of owner, partner, main shareholder or management executive of the companies forming the abovementioned consortium to obtain a certificate that none of them fell within any case of incompatibility as provided for in Article 3 of Law 3021/2002.

42 After having found that a member of the board of directors of Aktor ATE did fall within a case of incompatibility as set out in the national legislation, ESR, by document of 1 November 2004, refused to issue the certificate necessary for signature of the contract. The appeal brought by Aktor ATE against that refusal by ESR was dismissed by decision of that body of 9 November 2004. It is against those two negative decisions that, of the three companies comprising the consortium to which the contract was awarded, only Aktor ATE has brought an action for annulment before the national court, on the basis of the existing case-law of that court which regarded actions brought individually by members of a temporary association as admissible.

43 In those circumstances, the Simvoulio tis Epikratias, sitting as a full court, decided to stay the proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

‘1. Accepting that a national provision in accordance with which only all the members of a consortium without legal personality which has participated unsuccessfully in a public procurement procedure can bring a legal action against the act awarding the contract, and not consortium members individually, is not in principle contrary to Community law and specifically to … Directive 89/665 …, and that that still applies where the legal action has initially been brought by all the members of the consortium but ultimately proves, as regards some of them, to be inadmissible, is it in addition necessary, from the viewpoint of application of that directive, to examine, in order to make a declaration of inadmissibility, whether those individual members thereafter retain the right to claim before another national court any damages which may be envisaged by a provision of national law?

2. When it has been held by settled case-law of a national court that an individual member of a consortium may also bring an admissible legal action against an act falling within a public procurement procedure, is it compatible with … Directive 89/665 … , interpreted in the light of Article 6 of the [ECHR] as a general principle of Community law, to dismiss a legal action as inadmissible, because of a change to that settled case-law, without the person who has brought that legal action first being given either the opportunity to cure the inadmissibility or, in any event, the opportunity to set out, pursuant to the adversarial principle, his views relating to that issue?’

44 By order of the President of the Court of 22 May 2008, Cases C-145/08 and C-149/08 were joined for the purposes of the written and oral procedure and the judgment.

The questions referred

The questions referred in Case C-145/08

45 By its questions concerning the application of Directive 92/50 to a contract such as that at issue in the main proceedings, the national court asks whether Directive 89/665 applies to the present case, given that its application presupposes that one of the directives on public contracts referred to in Article 1 of Directive 89/665 is applicable. Thus, it is appropriate to consider those questions together and to ascertain whether such a contract falls within the scope of one of the directives referred to in that article.

46 It is apparent from both the detailed points in the order for reference and the classification of the transaction at issue in the main proceedings by the national court that that transaction is a mixed contract.

47 That contract comprises, essentially, an agreement under which ETA would sell 49% of the shares in EKP to AEAS (‘the “sale of shares” aspect’), an agreement under which AEAS would take over management of the casino business, in return for payment (‘the “services” aspect’) and an agreement under which AEAS would undertake to implement a development plan, comprising refurbishment of the casino and two adjoining hotel units and development of stretches of surrounding land (‘the “works” aspect’).

48 It follows from the case-law of the Court that, in the case of a mixed contract, the different aspects of which are, in accordance with the contract notice, inseparably linked and thus form an indivisible whole, the transaction at issue must be examined as a whole for the purposes of its legal classification and must be assessed on the basis of the rules which govern the aspect which constitutes the main object or predominant feature of the contract (see, to that effect, Case C-3/88 Commission v Italy [1989] ECR 4035, paragraph 19; Case C-331/92 Gestión Hotelera Internacional [1994] ECR I-1329, paragraphs 23 to 26; Case C-220/05 Auroux and Others [2007] ECR I-385, paragraphs 36 and 37; Case

C-412/04 Commission v Italy [2008] ECR I-619, paragraph 47; and Case C-536/07 Commission v Germany [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraphs 28, 29, 57 and 61).

49 That conclusion is valid irrespective of whether or not the aspect constituting the main object of a mixed contract falls within the scope of the directives on public contracts.

50 Consequently, it is appropriate to consider whether the mixed contract at issue in the main proceedings constitutes an indivisible whole and, if so, whether, because of its main object, as a whole it falls within the scope of one of the directives referred to in Article 1 of Directive 89/665 which govern public contracts.

51 Firstly, that contract forms part of a partial privatisation of a public casino business, which was decided upon at a national level by the competent interministerial committee and was launched by a single invitation to tender.

52 It is apparent from the case file, in particular from the conditions in the additional notice published in April 2002, that the mixed contract at issue in the main proceedings is in the form of a single contract relating jointly to the sale of shares in EKP, the acquisition of the right to nominate the majority of the members of the board of directors of EKP, the obligation to assume management of the casino business and to offer high-level services in a profitable manner, and the obligation to refurbish and improve the sites concerned and surrounding land.

53 Those findings demonstrate the need to conclude that mixed contract with a single partner which has both the financial capacity necessary to purchase the shares in question and professional experience in operating a casino.

54 It follows that the various aspects of that contract must be understood as constituting an indivisible whole.

55 Secondly, it is apparent from the findings made by the national court that the main object of the mixed contract was the sale, to the highest bidder, of 49% of the shares in EKP and that the ‘works’ aspect of that transaction and the ‘services’ aspect, irrespective of whether the latter constitutes a public service contract or a service concession, were ancillary to the main object of the contract. The national court has also pointed out that the ‘works’ aspect was entirely ancillary to the ‘services’ aspect.

56 That assessment is confirmed by the documents submitted to the Court.

57 There can be no doubt that, where there is a purchase of 49% of the shares of a public undertaking such as EKP, that operation constitutes the main object of the contract. The point must be made that the income which AEAS would obtain as a shareholder appears to be significantly greater than the remuneration which it would obtain as a service provider. In addition, AEAS would receive that income for an unlimited time, while the management activity would cease after 10 years.

58 It follows from the foregoing considerations that the different aspects of the mixed contract at issue in the main proceedings constitute an indivisible whole, of which the aspect relating to the transfer of shares constitutes the main object.

59 The transfer of shares to a tenderer in the context of a privatisation of a public undertaking does not fall within the scope of the directives on public contracts.

60 Moreover, that is rightly pointed out in point 66 of the Green Paper on public-private partnerships and Community law on public contracts and concessions (COM(2004) 327 final).

61 In point 69 of its abovementioned Green Paper on public-private partnerships, the Commission points out that it is necessary to ensure that such a capital transaction does not in reality conceal the award to a private partner of contracts which might be termed public contracts or concessions. Nevertheless, in the present case, there is nothing in the documents to cast doubt on the nature of the transaction at issue in the main proceedings, as categorised by the national court.

62 Having regard to the foregoing considerations, the conclusion must be that a mixed contract of which the main object is the acquisition by an undertaking of 49% of the capital of a public undertaking and the ancillary object, indivisibly linked with that main object, is the supply of services and the performance of works does not, as a whole, fall within the scope of the directives on public contracts.

63 That conclusion does not preclude the fact that such a contract must observe the basic rules and general principles of the Treaty, in particular those on the freedom of establishment and the free movement of capital. However, there is no reason in the present case to consider the question of observance of those rules and principles, given that the result of such an examination could in no way lead to a finding that Directive 89/665 applies.

64 In the light of the foregoing, there is no need to answer the other questions referred in Case C-145/08.

The first question referred in Case C-149/08

65 By this question, the national court wishes to know, in essence, whether Directive 89/665 precludes a national rule, as interpreted by that court, under which only all members of a tendering consortium may bring an action against a decision of a contracting authority to award a contract, such that the members of that consortium, individually, are deprived not only of the possibility of having a decision of the contracting authority annulled, but also of the possibility of seeking compensation for individual damage suffered as a result of irregularities in the contract award procedure in question.

66 In order to answer that question, it must be noted that the act of which annulment is sought before the national court emanates from ESR, that is to say, an authority other than the contracting authority which organised the public procurement procedure at issue in the main proceedings.

67 It is apparent from the terms of Directive 89/665, commonly referred to as the ‘Remedies Directive’, that the protection granted by that directive covers the acts or omissions of contracting authorities.

68 Thus, it is clear from the wording of the fifth recital in the preamble to the directive and Article 1(1) thereof that they refer to measures to be taken in respect of decisions of contracting authorities. Similarly, under Article 1(3), Member States may require that a person seeking a review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement, so that that authority may remedy it. Furthermore, Article 3(2) of that directive gives the Commission the power to notify the contracting authority concerned of the reasons which have led it to conclude that, in a public procurement procedure, an infringement has been committed and to request its correction.

69 Accordingly, the conclusion must be that disputes relating to decisions of an authority such as ESR are not governed by the review system laid down by Directive 89/665.

70 However, the decisions of ESR are liable to have a certain effect on the conduct, or even the outcome, of a public procurement procedure, since they can lead to the exclusion of a tenderer, even a successful tenderer, who individually is characterised by one or another of the incompatibilities as laid down in the relevant national rules. Thus, those decisions are not devoid of interest in respect of the proper application of European Union law in that area.

71 In the present case, it is apparent from the information supplied by the national court that ESR’s decision, which led to the applicant in the main proceedings being deprived of the award of the public contract at issue when it had been designated as the successful tenderer, was, in that applicant’s opinion, adopted in breach of the provisions of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54) and of the principles arising under the primary legislation of the European Union.

72 The applicant in the main proceedings submits that, by the application of the contested national rules, it was prevented not only from seeking annulment of ESR’s allegedly unlawful decision, which led to its exclusion from the procedure at issue in the main proceedings, but also from seeking damages for the loss caused by that decision. Thus it was deprived of its right to effective judicial protection.

73 In that regard, it is important to note that the principle of effective judicial protection is a general principle of European Union law (see, to that effect, Case C-432/05 Unibet [2007] ECR I-2271, paragraph 37 and the case-law cited).

74 The Court has consistently held that, in the absence of Community rules governing the matter, it is for each Member State to designate the courts and tribunals having jurisdiction and to lay down the detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights which individuals derive from European Union law. Those detailed procedural rules must, however, be no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (principle of equivalence) and must not render practically impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by European Union law (principle of effectiveness) (see, to that effect, Case C-268/06 Impact [2008] ECR I-2483, paragraphs 44 and 46 and the case-law cited).

75 With regard to the principle of equivalence, it is apparent from the information supplied by the national court that, in accordance with the domestic law governing in general compensation for losses caused by unlawful acts of the State or public legal persons, it is the court having jurisdiction for the award of damages which also reviews, as an incidental matter, the legality of the administrative act complained of, which can lead, from an action brought individually by a natural person, to an award of compensation if the basic conditions laid down to that effect are met.

76 However, so far as concerns public contracts, an area covered by European Union law, those two types of jurisdiction, that is to say, on the one hand, the jurisdiction to annul or find the invalidity of an administrative act and, on the other, the jurisdiction to award compensation for the loss suffered, are, in the national law at issue in the main proceedings, held by two different courts.

77 Thus, in the area of public contracts, the combination of Article 5(2) of Law 2522/1997, which makes the award of damages subject to the prior annulment of the allegedly unlawful act, and Article 47(1) of Presidential Decree 18/1989, in accordance with which only all members of a consortium have locus standi to seek annulment of an act forming part of a procedure for the award of a public contract, means, as the national court points out, that it is impossible for any member of a consortium, acting individually, not only to seek annulment of the act adversely affecting it but also to apply to the competent court to obtain compensation for any damage it has suffered individually, whereas that does not appear to be impossible in other areas, by virtue of the rules of domestic law applicable to applications for compensation for loss caused by an unlawful act of a public authority.

78 With regard to the principle of effectiveness, it must be held that, by the application of the contested national rules, a tenderer such as the applicant in the main proceedings is deprived of any opportunity to claim, before the competent court, compensation for any damage it has suffered by reason of a breach of European Union law by an administrative act likely to have influenced the conduct and even the outcome of a public procurement procedure. Such a tenderer is thus deprived of effective judicial protection of the rights in that area of the law which it has under European Union law.

79 As the Advocate General observed in points 107 to 116 of her Opinion, it is important to note, in that regard, that the present situation differs from that which gave rise to the judgment in Espace Trianon and Sofibail. While that case concerned an action for annulment against a contract award decision which deprived the tendering consortium as a whole of the contract, the present case concerns an application for compensation for loss allegedly caused by an unlawful decision of an administrative authority which found that such an incompatibility existed, under the relevant national rules, in the case of the only applicant tenderer.

80 Having regard to the foregoing, the answer to the first question referred in Case C-149/08 is that European Union law, in particular the right to effective judicial protection, precludes a national rule, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, interpreted as meaning that the members of a temporary association, tenderer in a public procurement procedure, are deprived of the possibility of seeking, individually, compensation for the loss which they suffered individually as a result of a decision adopted by an authority, other than the contracting authority, involved in that procedure in accordance with the applicable national rules, which is such as to influence the conduct of that procedure.

81 In the light of that answer, there is no need to answer the second question referred in Case C-149/08.

Costs

82 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Fourth Chamber) hereby rules:

1. A mixed contract of which the main object is the acquisition by an undertaking of 49% of the capital of a public undertaking and the ancillary object, indivisibly linked with that main object, is the supply of services and the performance of works does not, as a whole, fall within the scope of the directives on public contracts.

2. European Union law, in particular the right to effective judicial protection, precludes a national rule, such as that at issue in the main proceedings, interpreted as meaning that the members of a temporary association, tenderer in a public procurement procedure, are deprived of the possibility of seeking, individually, compensation for the loss which they suffered individually as a result of a decision adopted by an authority, other than the contracting authority, involved in that procedure in accordance with the applicable national rules, which is such as to influence the conduct of that procedure.

(Public procurement – Contract comprising a transfer of shares and a service element – Classification – Review procedures for the award of contracts – National rule precluding individual appeals by members of an ad hoc consortium lacking legal personality – Change in case-law)

Introduction

1. These two factually and procedurally complex cases, which have been joined by the Court, raise questions of Community public procurement law concerning, in particular, the Remedies Directive (2) and the Services Directive. (3)

2. The ultimate issue in both cases concerns the admissibility of an action, brought by an individual member of an ad hoc consortium without legal personality which was unsuccessful in its bid for a contract, seeking annulment of a decision taken in the course of an award procedure.

3. The Court has already held that the Remedies Directive does not preclude a national rule to the effect that, where the members of such a consortium wish to bring an action against the decision awarding the contract, they must all act together and the action must be admissible in respect of each of them individually. (4)

4. However, the situation in the present cases has the added features that the decision challenged is not the final award but a preliminary decision on eligibility to be awarded the contract, taken not by the contracting authority but by a distinct regulatory authority, and that the decision is of specific relevance to only one member of the consortium and/or its annulment is sought with a view not to obtaining the final award but to being able to seek damages in respect of alleged irregularities in the decision. The issue is further complicated by the fact that national case-law has changed during the course of the proceedings, so that an action which might initially have been admissible can no longer be admissible.

5. Those issues are raised in relation to the Remedies Directive. The applicability of that directive is dependent on a contract's falling within the scope of, inter alia, the Services Directive or the Works Directive. (5) Its applicability is not in doubt in the second case, where the contract is agreed to be subject to the Works Directive. It is, however, less certain in the first case, where the Services Directive may or may not be applicable, depending on whether the award in question is classified as a service contract or a service concession (which would not fall within its scope).

6. A prior question in the first case is therefore how to classify the contract in issue, namely, a mixed contract in which: a public authority sells 49% of the shares in a public casino at a price offered by the highest bidder, to whom it hands over management of the casino and the right to appoint the majority of its directors; that management is remunerated by a percentage of the operating profits; the successful bidder undertakes to implement an improvement and modernisation plan; and the public authority, if it operates any other casino in future within the region concerned, undertakes to compensate the successful bidder.

7. A further issue concerns the extent to which the availability of the remedy in question may be required by fundamental rules and principles of Community law, even if the Remedies Directive does not apply.

Legislative background

Community legislation

The Services Directive (92/50)

8. Article 1(a) defines public service contracts as

'contracts for pecuniary interest concluded in writing between a service provider and a contracting authority' to the exclusion of, in particular, public supply contracts and public works contracts, and contracts awarded in the water, energy, transport and telecommunications sectors, all of which are governed by other directives. A number of other types of contract, defined by their subject-matter, are also excluded, but they do not appear relevant for present purposes. Under Article 1(b), contracting authorities are defined as

'the State, regional or local authorities, bodies governed by public law, associations formed by one or more of such authorities or bodies governed by public law' and, under Article 1(c), a service provider is

'any natural or legal person, including a public body, which offers services'.

9. Article 2 provides that, if a public contract is intended to cover both supplies and services, it is to fall within the scope of the directive if the value of the services exceeds that of the products.

10. Article 3(1) requires contracting authorities to apply procedures adapted to the provisions of the directive, and Article 3(2) requires them to ensure that there is no discrimination between service providers.

11. Article 8 stipulates that contracts for services listed in Annex I A (6) are to be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI, (7) while, under Article 9, contracts for services listed in Annex I B are to be awarded in accordance with Articles 14 and 16, which are in Titles IV and V respectively. Under Article 10, contracts for services listed in both annexes are to be awarded in accordance with the provisions of Titles III to VI where the value of the services listed in Annex I A is greater than the value of those listed in Annex I B and, in other cases, in accordance with Articles 14 and 16.

12. Article 14 concerns, essentially, technical specifications to be included in the general or contractual documents in each case, and Article 16 concerns publication of a notice of the award of a contract.

13. None of the services listed in Annex I A appears relevant to the question of classification raised in the first of the present cases. Annex I B, however (to which only Articles 14 and 16 apply), includes (17) 'Hotel and restaurant services', (26) 'Recreational, cultural and sporting services' and (27) 'Other services'. It is common ground that the services in issue fall within one or more of those categories.

14. Article 26(1) provides: 'Tenders may be submitted by groups of service providers. These groups may not be required to assume a specific legal form in order to submit the tender; however, the group selected may be required to do so when it has been awarded the contract.' (8)

The Remedies Directive (89/665)

15. Although the title of the Remedies Directive still refers only to public supply and public works contracts, it was none the less amended by the Services Directive to cover contracts falling within the scope of the latter.

16. Following that amendment, (9) Article 1 provides:

'1. The Member States shall take the measures necessary to ensure that, as regards contract award procedures falling within the scope of [inter alia, the Works and Services Directives], decisions taken by the contracting authorities may be reviewed effectively and, in particular, as rapidly as possible in accordance with the conditions set out in the following Articles and, in particular, Article 2(7) on the grounds that such decisions have infringed Community law in the field of public procurement or nation[al] rules implementing that law.

2. Member States shall ensure that there is no discrimination between undertakings claiming injury in the context of a procedure for the award of a contract as a result of the distinction made by this Directive between national rules implementing Community law and other national rules.

3. The Member States shall ensure that the review procedures are available, under detailed rules which the Member States may establish, at least to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular public supply or public works contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement. In particular, the Member States may require that the person seeking the review must have previously notified the contracting authority of the alleged infringement and of his intention to seek review.'

17. Article 2 provides, in particular:

'1. The Member States shall ensure that the measures taken concerning the review procedures specified in Article 1 include provision for the powers to:

(a) take, at the earliest opportunity and by way of interlocutory procedures, interim measures with the aim of correcting the alleged infringement or preventing further damage to the interests concerned, including measures to suspend or to ensure the suspension of the procedure for the award of a public contract or the implementation of any decision taken by the contracting authority;

(b) either set aside or ensure the setting aside of decisions taken unlawfully, including the removal of discriminatory technical, economic or financial specifications in the invitation to tender, the contract documents or in any other document relating to the contract award procedure;

(c) award damages to persons harmed by an infringement.

5. The Member States may provide that where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision was taken unlawfully, the contested decision must first be set aside by a body having the necessary powers.

6. The effects of the exercise of the powers referred to in paragraph 1 on a contract concluded subsequent to its award shall be determined by national law.

Furthermore, except where a decision must be set aside prior to the award of damages, a Member State may provide that, after the conclusion of a contract following its award, the powers of the body responsible for the review procedures shall be limited to awarding damages to any person harmed by an infringement.

7. The Member States shall ensure that decisions taken by bodies responsible for review procedures can be effectively enforced.

National law

Casino licences

18. Under Article 1(7) of Law 2206/1994 governing casinos, (10) casino licences are to be granted following a public international tendering procedure organised by a seven-member commission. In accordance with Article 3, casinos are subject to State control.

Ineligibility for award of public contracts

19. Law 3021/2002, implementing Article 14(9) of the Greek Constitution, provides for restrictions on the award of public contracts to persons having active interests in the news media sector. It establishes an irrebuttable presumption of incompatibility as between the status of owner, partner, major shareholder or management executive of an undertaking active in that sector and that of owner, partner, major shareholder or management executive of an undertaking which is awarded a works, supply or services contract by the State or by a legal entity in the public sector (the presumption extending also to certain family members). (11)

20. Before awarding or signing the contract, the contracting authority must obtain from the Ethniko Simvoulio Radiotileorasis (National Council for Radio and Television, the ‘ESR’) a certificate that there is no such incompatibility. Failure to do so renders the contract null and void. The ESR’s decision is binding, but may be challenged in the courts by any person with an interest.

21. In its recent judgment in Michaniki, (12) the Court held that such an irrebuttable presumption was precluded by Community law, even if it pursued the legitimate objectives of equal treatment of tenderers and of transparency in award procedures. The Court did not, however, state that Community law would preclude a rebuttable presumption of the kind described.

Remedies in procurement procedures

22. The Remedies Directive is transposed in Greece by Law 2522/1997, Article 2(1) of which provides that any person having an interest in the award of a public works, supply or services contract and liable to be adversely affected by a breach of Community or national law may, in accordance with certain detailed rules, apply to the courts for interim relief, for annulment, or a finding of invalidity, of the unlawful act, and for damages.

23. Article 4(1) of the same law specifies that the right to seek annulment or a finding of invalidity applies when the alleged breach of Community or national law concerns any step in the procedure leading up to the award. Article 4(2) provides that, if an act or omission of the contracting authority is declared void after the contract is awarded, and unless the award procedure has been suspended as a measure of interim relief, the contract itself is not affected; in that case the applicant may seek damages in accordance with Article 5.

24. Article 5(1) specifies that the right to seek damages is governed by Articles 197 and 198 of the Civil Code (providing for liability in damages arising out of negotiations) and that any provision excluding or restricting that right is inapplicable. Article 5(2) provides (in accordance with Article 2(5) of the Remedies Directive) that damages cannot be awarded unless the competent court has first annulled the unlawful act or omission in question or made a finding of invalidity, but allows an action for a finding of invalidity and an action for damages to be combined in accordance with the generally applicable rules.

25. Article 47(1) of Presidential Decree 18/1989, codifying the laws relating to the Simvoulio tis Epikratias (Council of State) allows any natural or legal person whose legitimate interests are affected by an administrative act to seek its annulment.

26. In a line of chamber decisions dating from 1992, that court (which appears to have sole jurisdiction to rule on the validity of public procurement procedures) consistently interpreted that provision in such a way as to allow an action for annulment of the award of a public contract to be brought by individual members of a consortium taking part in the procedure. In the course of the main proceedings in the present two cases, however, the court in plenary formation has decided that such an action is inadmissible unless brought jointly by all the members of the consortium (on the ground, essentially, that only the consortium as constituted for the purposes of the procedure could be awarded the contract if the original award were annulled). That interpretation, in conjunction with Article 5(2) of Law 2522/1997, has implications for the availability of an action for damages in respect of an irregularity in the procedure brought by an individual member of the consortium.

Facts, procedure and questions referred

Case C-145/08

27. In October 2001, the competent interministerial committee decided to privatise Elliniko Kazino Parnithas AE (‘EKP’, a subsidiary of Ellinika Touristika Akinita AE, ‘ETA’), a casino undertaking wholly owned by the Greek State. The notice of invitation to tender provided for an initial preselection stage to determine which tenderers met the conditions set out. The successful tenderer was to be selected at a subsequent stage. Two consortia were preselected.

28. The terms were set out in detail in a draft contract annexed to a supplementary notice in April 2002. (13)

29. Article 3 of those terms stated that the contract was to be a ‘mixed’ contract comprising, in summary, four agreements under which, respectively:

– ETA would sell (49% of the) shares in EKP to ‘AEAS’ (a ‘single purpose limited company’ to be set up by the successful tenderer); (14)

– AEAS would acquire the right to appoint the majority of EKP’s board of directors and thus to administer the company in accordance with the terms of the contract;

– AEAS would take over the management of the casino business, in return for payment;

– AEAS, as administrator of EKP and as manager of the casino business, would undertake vis-à-vis ETA to implement a development plan to be approved by EKP's board of directors.

30. The development plan was to comprise refurbishing the casino and enhancing the facilities offered, refurbishing and improving two adjoining hotel units and developing stretches of surrounding land, all to be completed within 750 days of obtaining planning permission.

31. Article 14 of the draft contract concerned AEAS's management of the casino and remuneration thereof. Essentially, the management was to be prudent, entirely in accordance with the law and financially profitable for EKP (Article 13(7) specified in addition that EKP was to be administered in such a way as to achieve an annual pre-tax profit of at least EUR 105 000 000 in the first five years). In return, AEAS would receive a sum no greater than a scaled percentage of the annual operating profits (decreasing from 20% of profits up to EUR 30 000 000 to 5% of profits over EUR 90 000 000) and 2% of turnover.

32. Under Article 21(1) of the draft contract, if ETA were to operate lawfully any other casino in the same region (Attica) within 10 years from the date of effect of the contract, it would have to pay AEAS compensation equal to 70% of the price of the shares acquired in EKP by AEAS, reduced by one tenth each year.

33. Under Article 23(1), the contract would terminate at the end of the 10th year from taking effect. (15)

34. The contract was awarded to a group led by Hyatt Regency Xenodocheiaki kai Touristiki (Thessaloniki) AE (now renamed Regency Entertainment Psychagogiki Touristiki AE) ('Regency'). ETA therefore sought and obtained from the ESR a certificate that none of the owners, partners, major shareholders or management executives of the undertakings in the consortium presented any incompatibility as provided for in Law 3021/2002.

35. An action for annulment of the ESR's decision, in which it is alleged that a management executive of one member of the Regency consortium did have an incompatible connection with the news media sector (being the son of a major shareholder in a Greek media group), is now before the Simvoulio tis Epikratias.

36. The action was lodged in the name of the unsuccessful tendering consortium and all seven of its members. A chamber of the Simvoulio tis Epikratias dismissed it in so far as it was brought by the consortium as a whole and by four of its members, because they did not appear and the lawyer had not been duly authorised to act on their behalf. In so far as the action was brought by the remaining three members, including Club Hotel Loutraki ('Loutraki'), the chamber referred the case to the plenary court in view of its importance. In doing so, the chamber applied the then settled case-law under which an action brought by certain members of a consortium could be admissible. Its ruling of inadmissibility as regards the other applicants is now irrevocable and cannot be reviewed in the procedure before the plenary court, which has – in the meantime – reversed the previously settled case-law. (16)

37. As regards the substance of the action, the Simvoulio tis Epikratias points out that the contract is mixed, in that it comprises (i) a sale of shares to the successful tenderer which, as such, is not subject to Community procurement rules, (ii) a service contract to be concluded with that tenderer, who undertakes the management of the casino premises and (iii) an undertaking to carry out certain works. Of the three parts, according to the referring court, (i) is the main purpose of the contract, (ii) is ancillary and (iii) is the least important.

38. The referring court wonders whether part (ii) of the contract can be classified as a public service concession, not subject to Community directives. That might depend on the extent to which the successful tenderer bears the risk in operating the services concerned, bearing in mind that they relate to activities which, under national law, may be subject to exclusive or special rights. It could also be relevant that running a casino has never in any way constituted a public service in Greek law – although the term 'public service' might have to be defined as a concept of Community law.

39. If the Court should consider that part (ii) of the contract is a public service contract, the national court then wonders whether the action for annulment of the ESR's decision falls within the scope of the Remedies Directive. The services concerned fall within Annex I B to the Services Directive, and contracts for such services are subject only to Articles 14 and 16 of the directive, which impose procedural obligations. The referring court none the less wonders whether the principle of equal treatment of tenderers, which the Remedies Directive is designed to protect, applies also in such cases.

40. If the Remedies Directive does apply, the national court notes that, according to Espace Trianon and Sofibail, (17) a national rule which requires an action for annulment of a decision awarding a public contract to be brought by all the members of a tendering consortium is not contrary to that directive. However, it wonders whether that applies to all types of judicial protection guaranteed by the directive, in particular to claims for damages. The combination of the various national rules means that individual members of an unsuccessful tendering consortium are prevented not only from seeking annulment of the act adversely affecting them jointly but also from obtaining compensation for any damage they have suffered individually. Their ability to seek redress is thus dependent on the will of the other members of the consortium, whose interest in obtaining reparation may be different.

41. The issue is complicated by the fact that, pursuant to Article 2(5) of the Remedies Directive, Greece has made a claim for damages in the field of public procurement conditional on prior annulment of the unlawful act, with different courts having jurisdiction over the two matters – the Simvoulio tis Epikratias is competent as regards validity, whereas the ordinary courts are competent in damages. That is in contrast to the general situation concerning reparation for damage caused by unlawful acts of the State or of public bodies, where the court hearing the claim for damages also reviews the legality of the administrative act.

42. It might therefore be considered that a procedure intended to safeguard rights deriving from Community law was less favourable than a procedure to safeguard comparable rights deriving from national law.

43. Finally, the Simvoulio tis Epikratias wonders whether the procedural situation, in which the current case-law requires an action of the kind in question to be brought jointly by all members of a consortium but the action as brought by only three members had been declared admissible under previous case-law, is compatible with the right to a fair hearing, as a fundamental principle of Community law and as set out in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights, and with the principle of protection of legitimate expectations.

44. The Simvoulio tis Epikratias therefore seeks a preliminary ruling on the following questions:

'(1) Does a contract by which the contracting authority entrusts to the contracting undertaking the management of a casino business and the execution of a development plan consisting in the upgrading of the casino premises and the commercial exploitation of the possibilities offered by the casino's licence, and which contains a term under which the contracting authority is obliged to pay the contracting undertaking compensation should another casino lawfully operate in the wider area in which the casino in question operates, constitute a concession, not governed by [the Services Directive]?

(2) If [question 1] is answered in the negative: does a legal action which is brought by persons who have participated in the procedure for the award of a public contract of mixed form providing inter alia for the supply of services subject to Annex I B to [the Services Directive], and in which they plead breach of the principle of equal treatment of participants in tender procedures (a principle affirmed by Article 3(2) of that directive), fall within the field of application of [the Remedies Directive], or is its application precluded inasmuch as, in accordance with Article 9 of [the Services Directive], only Articles 14 and 16 of the latter apply to the procedure for the award of the abovementioned contract for the supply of services?

(3) If [question 2] is answered in the affirmative: [(18)] accepting that a national provision in accordance with which only all the members of a consortium without legal personality which has participated unsuccessfully in a public procurement procedure can bring a legal action against the act awarding the contract, and not consortium members individually, is not in principle contrary to Community law and specifically to [the Remedies Directive], and that that still applies where the legal action has initially been brought by all the members of the consortium jointly but ultimately proves, as regards some of them, to be inadmissible, is it in addition necessary, from the viewpoint of application of that directive, to examine, in order to make a declaration of inadmissibility, whether those individual members thereafter retain the right to claim before another national court any damages which may be envisaged by a provision of national law?

(4) When it has been held by settled case-law of a national court that an individual member of a consortium may also bring an admissible legal action against an act falling within a public procurement procedure, is it compatible with [the Remedies Directive], interpreted in the light of Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights as a general principle of Community law, to dismiss a legal action as inadmissible, because of a change to that settled case-law, without the person who has brought that legal action first being given either the opportunity to cure the inadmissibility or, in any event, the opportunity to set out, pursuant to the adversarial principle, his views relating to that issue?'

45. In 2004, in the context of a public works procurement procedure for the construction of a town hall and underground car park, (19) the city of Thessaloniki awarded the contract to a consortium comprising the companies Aktor ATE ('Aktor'), Themeliodomi AE and Domotechniki AE. The ESR, consulted on the existence of a possible incompatibility within the meaning of Law 3021/2002, found that a major shareholder of a company which was one of Aktor's major shareholders did have an incompatible connection with the news media sector (being the son of a major shareholder in a Greek media group (20)), and refused to issue a certificate for the consortium. Aktor, alone of the members of the consortium, requested the ESR to reconsider its decision and has now applied to the Simvoulio tis Epikratias for review of the ESR's dismissal of that request. It did so on the basis of the existing case-law allowing such actions to be brought by individual members of a consortium. However, the plenary court, in the course of its consideration of both this and the Loutraki case, has overturned that case-law, with the effect that it is no longer possible for Aktor to seek to resolve the problem.

46. In that regard, the case thus raises similar issues to those in Case C-145/08. The Simvoulio tis Epikratias therefore seeks a preliminary ruling on two questions, identical to questions 3 (with the exception of the introductory phrase) and 4 in Case C-145/08.

Procedure before the Court of Justice

47. By order of 22 May 2008, the two cases were joined for the purposes of the written and oral procedure and the judgment.

48. Written observations have been submitted to the Court by Loutraki, by three members of the successful tendering consortium in Case C-145/08 – namely, Athens Resort Casino AE ('Athens Resort') jointly with Regency, and Ellaktor AE ('Ellaktor') – by Aktor (the applicant in the main proceedings in Case C-149/08), by the Greek Government and by the Commission.

49. At the hearing on 11 June 2009, Loutraki, Athens Resort, Aktor, the Greek Government and the Commission presented oral argument.

Assessment

50. The two questions in Case C-149/08 are identical to the last two questions in Case C-145/08. For the sake of simplicity, I shall refer to all the questions by their numbering in the latter case – that is to say, as I have set them out above.

Question 1

51. The essential issue that the national court must determine is whether the contract in issue is one to which the Remedies Directive applies specifically, or whether it is simply subject, more generally, to the fundamental rules of Community law and the principles of the Treaty – which apply, in any event, to Member States' public procurement procedures as long as they present a certain cross-border interest. (21)

52. That task is, however, complicated by the fact that the contract incorporates a number of disparate elements, of unequal importance in the whole. They are, essentially, a transfer of shares, an undertaking to provide a service for remuneration and an undertaking to implement a programme of works. Moreover, the service element might be viewed as a service contract (in which case it could be, taken in isolation, subject to at least two of the provisions of the Services Directive) or as a service concession (in which case it would fall outside the scope of that directive but would remain subject to the fundamental rules and principles of the EC Treaty (22)). I shall deal with those two issues in turn.

Mixed contracts

53. It may be helpful to begin by recalling briefly (23) the approach of Community law to mixed contracts – bearing in mind always that the actual classification of the contract is a matter solely for the national court on the basis of the facts before it.

54. When faced with a public award procedure comprising disparate elements which would, if treated separately, be subject to different sets of rules, the first step is to enquire whether such separate treatment would indeed have been possible. If so, any element which, taken on its own, falls within the scope of a particular procurement directive must be awarded in compliance with the provisions of that directive. (24) If not, it must be decided which rules apply to the whole.

55. In Gestión Hotelera Internacional, (25) the Court held that, where a mixed contract relates to both a transaction within the scope of a procurement directive (in that case, a public works contract) and a transaction otherwise outside the scope of Community procurement law (in that case, an assignment of property in the form of a lease), the contract as a whole will not fall within the scope of the directive if the former is merely incidental to the latter.

56. In the same vein, if a contract contains elements relating to different types of public contract, it is the main purpose or object which determines which directive is to be applied. (26)

57. That case-law coincides with the approach expressed by the legislature in the 16th recital in the preamble to the Services Directive: '… public service contracts, particularly in the field of property management, may from time to time include some works; … for a contract to be a public works contract, its object must be the achievement of a work; … in so far as these works are incidental rather than the object of the contract, they do not justify treating the contract as a public works contract'.

58. Pursuant to Article 2 of that directive, a mixed supply and service contract is to be categorised according to which part has the greater value and, pursuant to Article 10, the same principle applies where contracts cover services listed in both Annex I A and Annex I B.

59. Clearly, relative value is a simple and objective criterion for determining whether a particular aspect is the principal object of a contract or merely incidental. However, since the application of the Community directives is triggered at different value thresholds for different types of contract, it cannot be the only criterion, or there could be a danger of manipulation in order to remove certain contracts from the scope of the procurement rules. (27)

60. From the order for reference, and from the wording of question 1, it seems that the referring court has performed the analysis I have outlined, and has reached the view that: (i) the transfer of shares is the main purpose of the procedure and falls outside the scope of Community procurement rules; (ii) the service and works elements can be treated together, but separately from the sale of shares, and subjected to the rules of such directives as are applicable to them; (iii) the works element is merely incidental to the service element, so that the decisive factor is whether the service element is a service contract or a service concession.

61. That analysis is, of course, fully within the competence of the national court rather than this Court, and I shall therefore proceed on the same basis, even though several parties expressed at the hearing the view that the whole contract was indivisible and dominated by the sale of shares in EKP (a partial privatisation).

62. My only comment, with regard to that sale, is that I would agree with the position set out in the Commission's Green Paper on public-private partnerships and Community law on public contracts and concessions, (28) that:

'the provisions on freedom of establishment within the meaning of Article 43 of the Treaty must be applied when a public authority decides, by means of a capital transaction, to cede to a third party a holding conferring a definite influence in a public entity providing economic services normally falling within the responsibility of the State.

In particular, when the public authorities grant an economic operator a definite influence in a business under a transaction involving a capital transfer, and when this transaction has the effect of entrusting to this operator tasks falling within the scope of the law on public contracts which had been previously exercised, directly or indirectly, by the public authorities, the provisions on freedom of establishment require compliance with the principles of transparency and equality of treatment, in order to ensure that every potential operator has equal access to performing those activities which had hitherto been reserved.'

63. Consequently, the fundamental rules and principles of the Treaty will apply in any event to the whole contract, even if it transpires that the more detailed rules of the Remedies Directive apply only to the service element and its incidental works contract.

64. In that regard, the question is whether the service element on the basis of which the contract is to be classified is a service contract or a service concession.

65. Before addressing that point, however, I would rule out the suggestion that, independently of any other ground, the contract could be excluded from the scope of the Services Directive because the service involved – operating a casino – is not a public service in national law. The definition of a service within the meaning of the directive is a matter for Community law. (29) The definitions in Article 1 are broad, (30) and clearly intended to catch all service contracts awarded by public authorities. And, true though it may be that the State has no responsibility to make gaming facilities available to the public, the fact remains that, in many countries, there is considerable State involvement in gaming (often with a view, inter alia, to protecting the public from less scrupulous operators).

Service concessions

66. First of all, it is clear that, while public service concessions are indeed excluded from the scope of the Services Directive, (31) the directive contains no definition of a service concession.

67. None the less, at the material time in Case C-145/08, a Community legislative definition did exist, in the Works Directive, (32) of a public works concession, and that definition has since served as a basis for parallel definitions of service concessions in Directives 2004/17 (33) and 2004/18. (34) Also at the material time, the Commission had sought to define service concessions in a non-binding communication, (35) drawing on the Court's then existing case-law. (36) In Parking Brixen, (37) the Court referred to the definition in Directive 2004/18 as relevant to its conclusion on the definition of the contract in issue, even though – as is the case here – that directive did not formally apply at the material time. And, much more recently, in Eurawasser, (38) the Court has referred to its pre-2004 case-law in order to refine and complete the definition of a service concession in Directive 2004/17. The definition of a service concession in Community law derives, thus, from an interlacement of legislation, case-law and guidance which appears stable over time.

68. The essence of the definition in the 2004 directives is that a service concession is a contract which meets the definition of a service contract 'except for the fact that the consideration for the provision of services consists either solely in the right to exploit the service or in [that] right together with payment'. (39) That corresponds to the Court's criterion of 'remuneration [which] comes not from the public authority concerned, but from sums paid by third parties'. (40)

69. Such a criterion does appear to be met in the case of the award in issue. According to the terms of the contract as set out in the order for reference, the successful tenderer (or AEAS) is remunerated essentially by a proportion of the profits and/or turnover derived from the operation of the casino under its own management. That remuneration comes therefore from 'sums paid by third parties', even if it does not represent the whole of those sums.

70. However, in addition, the Court has stressed that an essential feature of a public service concession is that the concession holder assumes the risk of operating the services in question. (41)

71. That aspect has been the subject of debate in the present context, particularly with regard to the extent of local competition and the compensation to which AEAS is entitled if another casino is opened in the same administrative region. Athens Resort, Ellaktor and the Greek Government argue that the risk assumed by the successful tenderer is real and justifies classification as a service concession, whereas Loutraki takes the opposite view. The Commission also inclines towards the view that it is not a concession but – rightly – points out that the actual degree of risk transferred by the contracting authority and assumed by the successful tenderer can be assessed only by the national court.

72. Since the hearing in the present case, the Court has given some further guidance on what kind and degree of transfer of risk is required for a contract to be categorised as a service concession. In Eurawasser, (42) it ruled that 'in relation to a contract for the supply of services, the fact that the supplier does not receive consideration directly from the contracting authority, but is entitled to collect payment under private law from third parties, is sufficient for that contract to be categorised as a "service concession" …, where the supplier assumes all, or at least a significant share, of the operating risk faced by the contracting authority, even if that risk is, from the outset, very limited on account of the detailed rules of public law governing that service'.

73. The Court thus took the view that what matters is not that the operating risk should be significant in itself but that whatever risk is already assumed by the contracting authority should be transferred, either fully or to a significant extent, to the successful tenderer.

74. It is true that in that case the Court expressly had regard to the fact that the limitation of the risk in issue derived from public regulations (common in the utilities sector) which were, on the one hand, beyond the control of the contracting authority and, on the other hand, such as to reduce the likelihood of any adverse effect on transparency or competition. (43)

75. However, I do not think that such a criterion can be decisive. The Court also stated that 'it must remain open to the contracting authorities, acting in all good faith, to ensure the supply of services by way of a concession, if they consider that to be the best method of ensuring the public service in question, even if the risk linked to such an operation is limited'. (44) It seems to me that the notion of a service concession cannot depend on there being a risk of actual failure but must include all cases where the operation of the service will be subject to the normal fluctuations of economic activity, which the operator must absorb.

76. The assessment is of course a matter for the national court in each case. However, from the details given in the order for reference, it seems plausible that such a condition is met in the case of the contract in the present case.

77. Like many other businesses, a casino (even a State-run casino), involves a degree of risk. (45) Gaming and ancillary facilities can only be run at a certain cost, following a certain investment, and there are no guaranteed takings or clientele. Demand for gaming services may vary, even widely, depending on many factors, including, but not limited to, competition. And the mere fact that a service can be predicted with some assurance to be profitable cannot affect its ability to be provided in the form of a concession.

78. In the present case, the risk already borne by the State in running the casino appears, under the terms of the contract, to have been transferred to a sufficient extent to AEAS. The latter has had to invest a considerable sum of money in the purchase of shares, has had to assume various obligations to redevelop the premises (apparently at its own expense), and receives remuneration the precise amount of which appears to be dependent on the way in which it runs the casino (for which it is responsible not only vis-à-vis itself but also vis-à-vis the contracting authority). It is true that some of the risk (the return on investment) remains with the State body ETA which retains 51% of the shares in the casino. None the less, AEAS does appear to assume a proportion of the risk commensurate with its own involvement.

79. The factor which has been raised by the Simvoulio tis Epikratias as possibly affecting the assumption of risk by the successful tenderer is the condition to the effect that, if ETA were to operate any other casino in the same region within 10 years from the date of effect of the contract, it would have to pay AEAS compensation based on the price of the shares transferred. That, clearly, protects AEAS rather effectively from the worst excesses of possible competition.

80. However, it does not, it seems to me, affect in any way the classification of the award as a service concession. Service contracts and service concessions are distinct concepts, the essence of one being easily distinguished from the essence of the other. In a service contract, the service provider receives agreed consideration (the amount of its tender) from the contracting authority which, if the service is intended for third parties who pay for it, takes any profits or covers any losses. The amount of the tender will be based on the predicted cost of providing the service. In a service concession, it is the service provider which takes the profits or covers the losses and pays an agreed sum (the amount of its tender) to the contracting authority. (46) The amount of the tender will be based on the predicted profits. Clearly, the probable extent of competition will affect that prediction, and thus the amount of the tender submitted (and, indeed, the willingness of any party to participate in the procedure at all), but I do not see that it can affect the nature of the transaction and turn a service concession into a service contract.

81. If I have correctly understood the circumstances of the case in the main proceedings, the amount of each tender was the amount the tenderer was willing to pay for the shares in EKP, calculated by taking into account, inter alia, the obligation to carry out certain works and the amounts which could be expected to accrue from the successful tenderer's share of the operating profits of the casino. If that is so, the compensation clause giving protection against competition for 10 years would certainly affect each tenderer's calculations, but would not change the nature of the award, which appears to be that of a service concession (albeit to an extent in partnership with the contracting authority) rather than a service contract.

82. I have taken that view on the basis of the terms of the contract as I understand them from the order for reference, and in particular from the wording of the question on which the Simvoulio tis Epikratias seeks guidance, but it is of course possible that other factors, to be assessed by that court, may reveal a rather different picture of the actual extent of the transfer of risk.

83. In any event, I suggest that the Court should indicate that a contract for services under which the contractor's remuneration comes from third parties is to be classed as a service concession, (47) and thus as falling outside the scope of the Services Directive, when the contractor assumes all or at least a significant part of the operating risks incurred by the contracting authority, even if that risk is limited from the outset, and that such classification is not affected by the fact that the contracting authority guarantees compensation in the event of subsequent competition, provided that such a guarantee does not significantly affect the extent of the transfer of risk (as opposed to the degree of risk on the basis of which each potential tenderer will assess his interest in participating and the amount which he is prepared to tender).

84. However, it must not be forgotten that, notwithstanding the fact that service concessions fall outside the scope of the Services Directive, the authorities concluding them are bound to comply with the fundamental rules and principles of the EC Treaty. (48)

Question 2

85. If, on the basis of the answer to question 1, the national court decides that the contract falls within the scope of the Services Directive, the question then arises whether the fact that the services concerned fall exclusively within the list in Annex I B to that directive affects the applicability of the Remedies Directive in the circumstances of the case.

86. In my view, it does not.

87. It is true that, as the Court pointed out in Commission v Ireland, (49) the directive is based on the assumption that contracts for services listed in Annex I B do not normally arouse such cross-border interest as to justify imposing rules to ensure that undertakings from other Member States can examine the contract notice and submit a tender, and that is why only minimal requirements are imposed for such contracts.

88. However (quite apart from the fact that the contract in the present case is undoubtedly of sufficient value to arouse cross-border interest), I agree here with the Commission that the Remedies Directive explicitly applies to all award procedures 'falling within the scope' (50) of the Services Directive, and that the services listed in Annex I B fall just as much within that scope as do those listed in Annex I A, no matter how limited the obligations actually imposed on them by the directive.

89. I thus do not accept the Greek Government's view that the Remedies Directive applies only to decisions alleged to be in breach of Articles 14 and 16 of the Services Directive, which are the only provisions to regulate contracts for services listed in Annex I B.

90. There is simply nothing in the wording of the Remedies Directive to indicate any intention to limit its application to proceedings in respect of the specific provisions of the substantive directive which apply to a particular procurement procedure. The aim is, on the contrary, to put an end to 'the absence of effective remedies or inadequacy of existing remedies [which] deter Community undertakings from submitting tenders in the Member State in which the contracting authority is established'. (51) That aim could not be adequately achieved if the Greek Government's approach were to be followed.

91. Moreover, as the national court points out in its question, in the main proceedings in Case C-145/08 the applicants are invoking the principle of equal treatment, which is specifically enshrined in Article 3(2) of the Services Directive. Article 3(2) is one of the general provisions in Title I of the directive and, on any normal reading, applies to all public service contracts within the meaning of Article 1(a). It is only with regard to Titles III to VI that a distinction is drawn between services listed in Annex I A and those listed in Annex I B.

92. If, however, on the basis of the answer to question 1, the national court considers that the contract is for a public service concession, then it clearly will not be subject to the specific provisions of the Remedies Directive. None the less, the fundamental rules and principles of the Treaty – including, of course, the principle of equal treatment – will still apply.

93. In Telaustria, (52) the Court stressed that those principles mean that it must be possible for the impartiality of procurement procedures to be reviewed, and it is settled case-law that individuals are entitled to effective judicial protection of the rights they derive from the Community legal order. (53)

94. What those requirements actually involve for the present cases is a matter to be addressed in the context of questions 3 and 4.

Question 3

95. As I understand it, by question 3 the national court wishes to know, in essence, whether the Espace Trianon and Sofibail case-law (54) (to the effect that the Remedies Directive does not preclude a national rule under which only the members of a tendering consortium acting together may bring an action against the decision awarding the contract, even if all the members act together but the application of one member is held inadmissible) might have to be nuanced if its application entailed depriving individual members not only of the possibility of having a decision of the contracting authority set aside, but also of the possibility of seeking compensation for individual damage suffered as a result of irregularities in the procedure.

96. The answer to that question therefore calls for an examination of the Court's reasoning in Espace Trianon and Sofibail.

97. I note that the legal background to the two cases is strikingly similar. In Espace Trianon and Sofibail, the legislative rule in issue was also embodied in a law governing the supreme administrative court, under which actions for annulment could be brought by any party establishing harm or an interest, and that rule had been interpreted as requiring the members of a consortium without legal personality which had participated unsuccessfully in a public procurement procedure to act together in order to bring an action against the decision awarding the contract. (55) The case concerned an action brought by both members of an unsuccessful tendering consortium, which was held inadmissible in respect of one of them because the decision to bring proceedings had not been taken by the competent organ of the company. (56)

98. The question was whether Article 1 of the Remedies Directive precluded a rule such as that in issue, either in general or in the circumstances of the case. (57)

99. The Court considered that the reference in Article 1(3) to 'any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a public contract' was to a person who, in tendering for a public contract, had demonstrated his interest in obtaining it. All the members of a consortium tendering as such would be obliged to sign the contract and carry out the work if the tender were accepted. In the main proceedings, nothing had prevented the members of the consortium from bringing a joint action for annulment of the decision awarding the contract. (58)

100. Therefore, a national rule requiring an action for annulment of a contracting authority's award to be brought by all the members of a tendering consortium did not limit the availability of such an action in a way contrary to Article 1(3) of the Remedies Directive, particularly because under Belgian law the members of a consortium could settle the issue of its capacity to bring legal proceedings by internal agreement. (59)

101. Nor did the rule require that a group of contractors must assume a specific legal form in order to submit a tender – only that, for the purpose of bringing proceedings, a consortium must be represented in accordance with the rules applying to the legal form which its members themselves assumed in order to be able to tender. Moreover, the rule applied in the same way to all actions brought by members of consortia, whether the claims were founded on a breach of Community law or of national law, or were related to public contracts or to other operations. (60)

102. Consequently, such a rule could not undermine the requirement for effective review laid down in Article 1(1) of the Remedies Directive. That principle did not require an action to be held admissible when the provisions relating to representation in legal proceedings, which stem from the legal form assumed, had not been adhered to as far as concerns the person bringing the proceedings. (61)

103. Finally, there was no reason to distinguish between an action brought from the outset by only some of the members of the consortium and one initially brought by all those members but in which the application of one of them was subsequently considered inadmissible. In both cases, admissibility was determined by national rules requiring only that applicants comply with the conditions relating to representation in legal proceedings in accordance with the legal form which the members had themselves chosen. Such general requirements did not limit the efficacy and availability of review procedures to tenderers in a manner contrary to the Remedies Directive. Furthermore, the inadmissibility of the application of one of the members of a consortium might be justified by circumstances showing that no intention to bring legal proceedings had been validly established for the member concerned. (62)

104. The Court has also made clear, however, in Consorzio Elisoccorso San Raffaele, (63) that a national rule which does allow members of a consortium to bring proceedings individually is in no way contrary to the Remedies Directive. Article 1(3) lays down a minimum requirement that the review procedures provided for must be available 'at least' to any person having or having had an interest in obtaining a particular contract and who has been or risks being harmed by an alleged infringement of the applicable law. A rule allowing individual actions, therefore, far from undermining the aim of the directive, appears likely to help attain it.

105. Consequently, the Simvoulio tis Epikratias is in no way precluded by the Remedies Directive from finding the actions in the main proceedings admissible.

106. The question is rather whether, in the circumstances of those proceedings, the current interpretation of the national legislation, leading to a finding of inadmissibility, (64) falls within the Espace Trianon and Sofibail case-law (in which case the Simvoulio tis Epikratias is not precluded from applying it) or whether the circumstances are so different as to render that interpretation incompatible with the directive.

107. Two differences in particular might be relevant in that regard. First, in Espace Trianon and Sofibail, the Court took account of the fact that it would have been possible, under Belgian law, for the members of the consortium to agree that it should be represented in proceedings by one of its members. That possibility does not appear to be available under Greek law, although that is of course a matter for the national court. Second, it took account of the fact that the rule applied to all actions brought by consortia, whether the claims were founded on a breach of Community law or of national law, or were related to public contracts or to other operations. In the present cases, however, it appears that the difficulty might not have arisen if the claim had been based on national law. (65)

108. I note moreover that, in her Opinion in Espace Trianon and Sofibail, Advocate General Stix-Hackl considered that the Court's ruling should be restricted to circumstances in which the action seeks annulment of the award made, and that 'it is perfectly conceivable that as regards a simple declaration of illegality and the availability of damages there might be other obligations under Community law'. (66)

109. Finally, the acts at issue in the present cases are not decisions of the contracting authority awarding or declining to award the contract to a consortium. They are, rather, decisions of another administrative body, concerning the eligibility of individual consortium members to be awarded a contract, which none the less bind the contracting authority.

110. Taking all those considerations into account, I think the Court would be justified in examining the requirements of the Remedies Directive afresh in the context of the present cases.

111. It is clear that, as a general rule, national law may provide that, where the person having or having had an interest in obtaining a contract is a consortium, a challenge to the decision awarding the contract must be brought by all the members of the consortium acting together (Espace Trianon and Sofibail). Likewise, it may provide that where damages are claimed on the grounds that a decision was taken unlawfully, the contested decision must first be set aside (Article 2(5) of the Remedies Directive).

112. It could therefore be inferred that, where national law makes such provision in both regards, Community law does not preclude the consequence that a claim for damages brought by a single member of a tendering consortium will always be inadmissible.

113. I do not, however, take that view.

114. The Court's reasoning in Espace Trianon and Sofibail (and, apparently, that of the Simvoulio tis Epikratias in its revised interpretation of national law) is based on the premiss that an unsuccessful tenderer's interest in having an award annulled lies in the opportunity of being again able to take part in the procedure as resumed after annulment of an unlawful decision, and that, where the tenderer is a consortium, only the consortium as such can legitimately have that interest. Individual members, not having submitted a tender in their own name (and often not in a position to do so, or they would not have formed a consortium with others), lack that interest.

115. That premiss, and the conclusions drawn from it, seem entirely justified. As regards the award of a contract, the members of a consortium must all act together. United they stand, divided they fall. Their interests are as inseparable as is the award of the contract.

116. However, that does not necessarily hold true where a claim for damages is concerned. A decision taken in the course of an award procedure may cause specific harm to one member of a consortium but not to others. Although it is not clear from the order for reference to what extent that may be so in Case C-145/08, Case C-149/08 illustrates such a situation. The finding of incompatibility concerned Aktor alone among the members of the consortium. Whilst all those members may have been adversely affected by not being awarded the contract, Aktor was individually stigmatised as a company ineligible for an award. Even if, as the Greek Government asserted at the hearing, decisions on eligibility are taken afresh in the context of each new procedure, (67) the contested decision is likely to have an adverse effect on Aktor's acceptability, in the eyes of other undertakings, as a member of future consortia.

117. But even when (as may be the case for Loutraki and its fellow applicants) the harm is spread among the members of the consortium – in proportion, for example, to the loss of opportunity suffered by each of them – individual claims for damages could be dealt with separately. Provided that the claim is solely for such apportionable damages, and there is no question of annulling the award so that the consortium as a whole can be reinstated in the procedure, it is of no decisive importance whether the action is brought by one, some or all of the members of the consortium.

118. In line with the Court's statement in Consorzio Elisoccorso San Raffaele, (68) the availability of an individual action in such circumstances would tend to further rather than hinder the Remedies Directive's aim of ensuring that Member States provide effective remedies and adequate procedures for compensating those harmed by an infringement of Community law. (69) By contrast, a rule which limits such availability would hinder rather than further that aim.

119. It must also be recalled that, in accordance with consistent case-law, where there are no applicable Community rules, it is for each Member State to lay down detailed procedural rules governing actions for safeguarding rights derived from Community law. Member States must ensure that those rights are effectively protected, and the procedural rules must be no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (in accordance with the principle of equivalence) and must not render practically impossible or excessively difficult the exercise of rights conferred by Community law (in accordance with the principle of effectiveness). (70)

120. As the Commission has pointed out, it is for the national court to determine whether either of those principles is affected by the domestic rules applicable in the present cases. To the extent necessary and possible, it must interpret those rules in conformity with Community law, and thus in such a way as to ensure that the two principles are respected.

121. In that regard, it seems that an interpretation and application of the rules in the manner currently envisaged by the Simvoulio tis Epikratias would render it impossible for a member of a consortium to pursue an individual claim for damages. That right is derived from Article 2(1)(c) of the Remedies Directive and is not, in my view, affected by the circumstance that other members of the same consortium have no individual interest of their own in pursuing such a claim.

122. Moreover, the national court itself points out, in its order for reference, that, as regards the general right under national law to obtain compensation for damage caused by a State or public body, the court hearing the action for damages examines at the same time the legality of the act alleged to have given rise to the damage whereas, in the present context, annulment must be obtained first from a different court. It thus appears, therefore, that the principles of effectiveness and equivalence would not be respected if an action for damages were not available to the applicants in the main proceedings because different courts have jurisdiction over the two remedies.

123. It has been suggested that the applicants enjoy sufficient judicial protection because they could claim damages against the other consortium members whose inaction has caused the proceedings to be dismissed. That does not appear to me to be a valid alternative. It seems both inequitable that compensation for any damage caused by a decision of the ESR should come from partners in the consortium and unlikely that the amount of compensation would be comparable, since the type of damage would be different and would stem from different conduct by different parties.

124. Consequently, I would answer question 3 to the effect that, even if under national law an action for annulment of a decision taken in the course of a procurement procedure is not available to individual members of a tendering consortium, it is necessary, before finding such an action inadmissible, to examine whether those individual members thereafter retain the right to claim damages before another court as a result of an alleged infringement of Community law. Such a right must remain available to them under conditions which are no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (in accordance with the principle of equivalence) and which do not render its exercise practically impossible or excessively difficult (in accordance with the principle of effectiveness).

125. I would add, with regard to Case C-145/08, that, in so far as the claim for damages is based on an infringement of one of the fundamental rules and principles of the Treaty which apply to the procurement procedure in question, then the right to effective judicial protection and the requirements of the principles of equivalence and effectiveness will still apply, even if the procedure itself is found to fall outside the scope of the Services Directive, and thus of the Remedies Directive.

126. This question concerns a situation in which (i) one or more applicants have brought an action against a decision taken in the course of a procurement procedure, (ii) that action was admissible on the basis of settled case-law at the time it was brought and (iii) the court hearing the case has concluded, in a reversal of its previous case-law, that the action is in fact inadmissible.

127. The Simvoulio tis Epikratias wishes to know, essentially, whether in such circumstances the Remedies Directive and the right to a fair hearing require the applicant(s) to be given an opportunity either to cure the defect in admissibility (which does not appear to be possible, under the normal rules, at the current stage of the procedure) or at least to express a view on the issue (which does not appear to have been the case prior to the reversal of the case-law).

128. In the light of my proposed answers to the earlier questions, in particular question 3, that question arises only if it transpires, on a final analysis, that the inadmissibility of an action brought by individual members of a tendering consortium against a decision taken in the course of the procurement procedure does not deprive those individual members of their right to claim damages before another court as a result of an alleged infringement of Community law and if that right does remain available to them under conditions which are no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions and which do not render its exercise practically impossible or excessively difficult. In other words, it arises only if the new interpretation of the national procedural rules proves to be fully compatible with Community law. Although that might seem doubtful on the information available, I shall respond to question 4 on the basis that it is so.

129. First, I would agree with Loutraki that, as a general rule, where a court reverses its previous case-law, that reversal must apply in the case in which it is decided (although there are of course situations in which the temporal effects of a ruling of principle may be limited to situations arising after a particular date (71)).

130. However, the specific issue in the present case is that the reversal appears to have been decided without the parties concerned having had an opportunity even to put their views, still less to correct such procedural defects as have emerged.

131. In the latter regard, the Simvoulio tis Epikratias itself and Aktor both state that, in previous cases where a comparable situation has arisen under national law, that court has consistently cited the principles of legitimate expectation and effective judicial protection in order to give parties the opportunity to cure any defect in admissibility which arises as a result of a reversal of case-law. If that is so, it seems clear to me that, as Aktor submits, the principle of equivalence requires the same approach to be followed where the procedure seeks to assert a right derived from Community law.

132. In that regard, it does not seem to me necessary to take account, as the Greek Government and a minority of the Simvoulio tis Epikratias suggest, of whether the proceedings were initially brought in conscious reliance on the previous case-law or not – unless that is a factor which is also taken into account in the other situations governed by national law.

133. More generally, I would agree with the Commission's submission that, here again, the national court must verify that, to the extent that the procedure falls within the scope of Community law, the fundamental principles of that law are observed. Those principles include legal certainty, legitimate expectation and the right to a fair trial within the meaning of Article 6 of the European Convention of Human Rights.

134. As regards the opportunity to present submissions on a reversal of case-law, the Commission recalls that this Court has noted, in proceedings relating to public procurement, that the European Court of Human Rights has consistently held the adversarial nature of proceedings to be a factor which enables their fairness to be assessed, even if it may be balanced against other rights and interests. The adversarial principle means, as a rule, that the parties have a right to inspect and comment on evidence and observations submitted to the court. (72)

135. In the present cases, as far as I can ascertain from the documents, the case-law appears to have been reversed at the initiative of the Simvoulio tis Epikratias. In such circumstances, it seems to me particularly important that the parties should be heard before a case is dismissed on unprecedented procedural grounds.

136. Several parties have pointed out that, at the present stage of the proceedings, which commenced several years ago, and in the interests of procedural efficiency, it may be unnecessary for the Simvoulio tis Epikratias to organise a further opportunity for the parties to be heard, since they have now had such an opportunity before this Court. In my view, that will be so only if the procedural rules of the Simvoulio tis Epikratias make provision for the arguments advanced before this Court during the reference to be taken fully into account when the matter returns before the national court after this Court has given judgment.

Conclusion

137. In the light of all the above considerations, I propose that the Court should reply as follows to the questions raised by the Simvoulio tis Epikratias.

In answer to the first question in Case C-145/08:

An award by which a contracting authority entrusts a contractor with the management and commercial exploitation of a casino business (service element) and the contractor undertakes to implement a development plan consisting in the upgrading of the casino premises (works element) may be classed as a service contract for the purposes of the Community public procurement directives if the works element is merely incidental to the service element. Such an award is, however, to be classed as a service concession, and thus as falling outside the scope of the Services Directive, when the contractor assumes all or at least a significant part of the operating risks incurred by the contracting authority, even if that risk is limited from the outset. Such classification is not affected by the fact that the contracting authority guarantees compensation in the event of subsequent competition, provided that such a guarantee does not significantly affect the extent of the transfer of risk, as opposed to the degree of risk on the basis of which each potential tenderer will assess his interest in participating and the amount which he is prepared to tender.

None the less, the award of a service concession must comply with the fundamental rules and principles of the EC Treaty.

In answer to the second question in Case C-145/08:

A legal action brought by persons who have participated in the procedure for the award of a public contract of mixed form providing inter alia for the supply of services subject to Annex I B to the Services Directive, and in which they plead breach of the principle of equal treatment of participants in tender procedures, affirmed by Article 3(2) of that directive, falls within the field of application of the Remedies Directive.

In answer to the third question in Case C-145/08 and the first question in Case C-149/08:

Even if under national law an action for annulment of a decision taken in the course of a procurement procedure is not available to individual members of a tendering consortium, it is necessary, before finding such an action inadmissible, to examine whether those individual members thereafter retain the right to claim damages before another court as a result of an alleged infringement of Community law. Such a right must remain available to them under conditions which are no less favourable than those governing similar domestic actions (in accordance with the principle of equivalence) and which do not render its exercise practically impossible or excessively difficult (in accordance with the principle of effectiveness).

In so far as the claim for damages is based on an infringement of one of the fundamental rules and principles of the Treaty which apply to the procurement procedure in question, then the right to judicial protection and the requirements of the principles of equivalence and effectiveness will still apply, even if the procedure itself is found to fall outside the scope of the Community procurement directives.

In answer to the fourth question in Case C-145/08 and the second question in Case C-149/08:

When it has been held by settled case-law of a national court that an individual member of a tendering consortium may bring an action against an act falling within a public procurement procedure, it is not compatible with the general principles of Community law to dismiss such an action as inadmissible because of a change to that settled case-law, unless the person who has brought that action has first been given either the opportunity to cure the inadmissibility or, in any event, to set out his views relating to that issue.

3 – Council Directive 92/50/EEC of 18 June 1992 relating to the coordination of procedures for the award of public service contracts (OJ 1992 L 209, p. 1). After the material time in the present cases, this directive was repealed and replaced by Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114).

7 – Title III is headed ‘Choice of award procedures and rules governing design contests’, Title IV ‘Common rules in the technical field’ and Title V ‘Common advertising rules’, while Title VI covers ‘Common rules on participation’, ‘Criteria for qualitative selection’ and ‘Criteria for the award of contracts’.

8 – I note that this provision is in Title VI and thus appears, formally at least, not to be applicable where the contract is for services listed in Annex I B. However, the point does not seem relevant in the present context, in so far as there is no suggestion that any specific legal form was required of the consortia concerned, whether such a requirement would have been prohibited by the directive or not.

---

9 – Since the material time in the present cases, Articles 1 and 2 in particular have been further amended, and further detailed rules introduced, by Directive 2007/66/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 11 December 2007 amending Council Directives 89/665/EEC and 92/13/EEC with regard to improving the effectiveness of review procedures concerning the award of public contracts (OJ 2007 L 335, p. 31).

---

10 – This provision is not cited in the order for reference, but the Greek Government has cited the text in its written observations.

---

11 – It appears that Law 3021/2003 has since been replaced by Law 3310/2005, amended by Law 3414/2005. Under the new measures, it appears that incompatibility derives from certain criminal convictions rather than from shareholdings.

---

12 – Case C-213/07 [2008] ECR I-0000, especially at paragraph 50 et seq. That judgment was delivered after the orders for reference had been made in the present cases, and after the written observations had been submitted.

---

13 – The relevant parts of the contract document are transcribed or summarised in the order for reference. I do not propose to take account of the partly conflicting version which the Greek Government appeared to put forward at one stage in the procedure. Such matters are in any event for the national court to determine.

---

14 – From the Greek Government’s reply to a written question put by the Court, it appears that the successful tenderer paid EUR 110 000 000 for the shares.

---

15 – I presume, although it is not spelt out in the order for reference, that this refers to the various undertakings relating to the management of the casino, and that the transfer of shares will not be affected.

17 – Cited in footnote 4, paragraph 22.

18 – Since question 2 is in fact posed as an alternative, I take this to mean: ‘If such an action does fall within the field of application of the Remedies Directive, …’.

---

19 – It is not disputed that this contract, with an estimated value of EUR 46 700 000, falls fully within the scope of the Works Directive, and thus of the Remedies Directive.

---

20 – It is curious to note that the person in question appears to be the same as the person in respect of whom Loutraki alleges an incompatibility in the context of its case, but in respect of whom the ESR has confirmed its finding that there was no incompatibility in that case.

Judgment

1 This reference for a preliminary ruling concerns the interpretation of Article 22 of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts (OJ 1993 L 199, p. 54), as amended by Directive 97/52/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 October 1997 (OJ 1997 L 328, p. 1) (‘Directive 93/37’), and the transitional legal relationship between that directive and Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts (OJ 2004 L 134, p. 114).

2 The reference was made in the course of proceedings brought by Hochtief AG and Linde-Kca-Dresden GmbH against the Közbeszerzések Tanácsa Közbeszerzési Döntőbizottság (Arbitration Committee of the Public Procurement Council, ‘the KTKD’) relating to a negotiated procedure with publication of a contract notice.

Legal framework

Community law

3 Article 1 of Directive 93/37 provides:

‘For the purposes of this Directive:

(g) “negotiated procedures” are those national procedures whereby contracting authorities consult contractors of their choice and negotiate the terms of the contract with one or more of them;

(h) a contractor who submits a tender shall be designated by the term “tenderer” and one who has sought an invitation to take part in a restricted or negotiated procedure by the term “candidate”.’

4 Article 7(2) of Directive 93/37 states:

‘The contracting authorities may award their public works contracts by negotiated procedure, with prior publication of a contract notice and after having selected the candidates according to publicly known qualitative criteria, in the following cases:

(a) in the event of irregular tenders in response to an open or restricted procedure or in the case of tenders which are unacceptable under national provisions that are in accordance with the provisions of Title IV, in so far as the original terms of the contract are not substantially altered. The contracting authorities shall not, in these cases, publish a contract notice where they include in such negotiated procedure all the enterprises satisfying the criteria of Articles 24 to 29 which, during the prior open or restricted procedure, have submitted tenders in accordance with the formal requirements of the tendering procedure;

(b) when the works involved are carried out purely for the purpose of research, experiment or development, and not to establish commercial viability or to recover research and development costs;

(c) in exceptional cases, when the nature of the works or the risks attaching thereto do not permit prior overall pricing.’

5 Article 18(1) of Directive 93/37 states:

‘Contracts shall be awarded on the basis of the criteria laid down in Chapter 3 of this Title, taking into account Article 19, after the suitability of the contractors not excluded under Article 24 has been checked by contracting authorities in accordance with the criteria of economic and financial standing and of technical knowledge or ability referred to in Articles 26 to 29.’

6 Article 22 of that directive provides:

‘1. In restricted and negotiated procedures the contracting authorities shall, on the basis of information given relating to the contractor’s personal position as well as to the information and formalities necessary for the evaluation of the minimum conditions of an economic and technical nature to be fulfilled by him, select from among the candidates with the qualifications required by Articles 24 to 29 those whom they will invite to submit a tender or to negotiate.

2. Where the contracting authorities award a contract by restricted procedure, they may prescribe the range within which the number of undertakings which they intend to invite will fall. In this case the range shall be indicated in the contract notice. … The range shall be determined in the light of the natur[e] of the work to be carried out. The range must number at least 5 undertakings and may be up to 20.

In any event, the number of candidates invited to tender shall be sufficient to ensure genuine competition.

3. Where the contracting authorities award a contract by negotiated procedure as referred to in Article 7(2), the number of candidates admitted to negotiate may not be less than three provided that there is a sufficient number of suitable candidates.

4. Each Member State shall ensure that contracting authorities issue invitations without discriminations to those nationals of other Member States who satisfy the necessary requirements and under the same conditions as to its own nationals.’

7 Article 80(1) of Directive 2004/18 provides:

‘1. The Member States shall bring into force the laws, regulations and administrative provisions necessary to comply with this Directive no later than 31 January 2006. They shall forthwith inform the Commission thereof.

...’

8 Article 82 of that directive, under the heading ‘[r]epeals’ states:

‘Directive 92/50/EEC, except for Article 41 thereof, and Directives 93/36/EEC and 93/37 … shall be repealed with effect from the date shown in Article 80, without prejudice to the obligations of the Member States concerning the deadlines for transposition and application set out in Annex XI.

References to the repealed Directives shall be construed as references to this Directive and shall be read in accordance with the correlation table in Annex XII.’

9 Directive 2004/18 entered into force on 30 April 2004.

National law

10 Directive 93/37 was transposed into Hungarian law by Law CXXIX of 2003 on the award of public contracts (a közbeszerzésekről szóló 2003 évi CXXIX. törvény, Magyar Közlöny 2003/157, ‘the Kbt’).

11 Article 130(1), (2) and (7) of the Kbt, which applies to negotiated procedures with publication of a contract notice, provides:

‘(1) The contracting authority shall, in that procedure, prescribe either the number of tenderers, or a range for the number of tenderers, so as to produce invitations to tender from a number of suitable candidates; a number which, if those candidates have submitted valid applications, may reach the upper limit of the range provided or, at the very least, a sufficient number of those candidates.

(2) The minimum number of participants or the lower limit of the range shall not be lower than three. That number or that range must be adapted to the nature of the contract and must, in any event, ensure genuine competition.

(7) The contracting authority shall, individually, directly and in writing, invite the selected candidates, the number of whom will tally with the prescribed number or come within the prescribed range – on the basis of their financial and economic capacity and their fulfilment of the technical and professional requirements – to submit their tenders, provided that there is a suitable number of candidates. If the contracting authority did not specify that number or range, it shall invite all suitable candidates to submit tenders. Candidates invited to submit a tender cannot submit a collective tender.'

12 At the date of the facts in the main proceedings, Directive 2004/18 had not yet been transposed into Hungarian law.

The dispute in the main proceedings and the questions referred for a preliminary ruling

13 The dispute in the main proceedings relates to a negotiated procedure for the award of a public works contract for an amount in excess of the Community threshold. The dispute is between two commercial undertakings established in Germany, Hochtief AG and Linde-Kca-Dresden GmbH, and the KTKD. The contracting authority for that contract, namely the Budapest Főváros Önkormányzata (Local Government for Budapest), intervened in the dispute in support of the KTKD.

14 On 5 February 2005, the Budapest Főváros Önkormányzata published, in the Official Journal of the European Union, a contract notice for the tender procedure at issue in the main proceedings. The prescribed range for the number of candidates who could be invited to submit a tender was three to five.

15 At the expiry of the period for the submission of applications, five candidates, including the consortium set up by the applicants in the main proceedings, had come forward. In the light of the applications submitted, the Budapest Főváros Önkormányzata, first, excluded the application of that consortium as inadmissible on the grounds of 'incompatibility' and, second, decided to continue with the procedure with the two candidates regarded as 'suitable', by issuing to them invitations to submit a tender.

16 The applicants in the main proceedings challenged the decision of the Budapest Főváros Önkormányzata before the KTKD, claiming, inter alia, that, under Article 130 of the Kbt, since the number of suitable candidates was below the prescribed minimum, the procedure could not continue. The KTKD rejected that challenge.

17 Thereafter, the applicants in the main proceedings brought legal proceedings against the KTKD's decision, relying, inter alia, on Article 22(2) and (3) of Directive 93/37. As the court seised of the matter at first instance also dismissed the action, the applicants in the main proceedings lodged an appeal before the referring court.

18 It is in those circumstances that the Fővárosi Ítélőtábla decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

'1. Is the procedure laid down in Article 44(3) of Directive 2004/18 …, which replaced Article 22 of … Directive 93/37 … applicable where the procurement procedure was initiated at a time when Directive 2004/18 … had already entered into force, but the time-limit granted to Member States for implementing that directive had not yet expired, so that the directive had not been incorporated into national law?

2. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, this court further asks whether in the case of negotiated procedures with publication of a contract notice – having regard to the fact that Article 44(3) of Directive 2004/18 … provides that "[i]n any event the number of candidates invited shall be sufficient to ensure genuine competition" – the limitation of the number of suitable candidates should be interpreted as meaning that in the second stage – that of awarding the contract – there must invariably be a minimum number of candidates (three)?

3. If the answer to the first question is in the negative, this court further asks … whether the requirement that "there be a sufficient number of suitable candidates", under Article 22(3) of Council Directive 93/37 …, should be interpreted as meaning that where the minimum number of suitable candidates invited to take part is not reached (three), the procedure cannot continue to the stage of invitation to tender?

4. If the Court … replies to the third question in the negative, this court further asks whether the second [sub]paragraph of Article 22(2) of Directive 93/37 – in the rules on restricted procedures, according to which "[i]n any event, the number of candidates invited to tender shall be sufficient to ensure genuine competition" – is applicable to two-stage negotiated procedures, governed by Article 22(3)?'

The questions referred

Preliminary observations

19 According to the applicants in the main proceedings, the referring court ought to have referred another question in addition to those referred, concerning the Hungarian legislation's failure to respect the principles of equal treatment, non-discrimination and proportionality, in that that legislation automatically excludes persons or entities which have taken part in the preparatory work for a public contract from the procedures for the awards of public contracts, without giving them the opportunity to prove that there is no threat to competition. According to the applicants, analogous measures contained in the national law of other Member States have been held to be incompatible with Community law in Joined Cases C-21/03 and C-34/03 Fabricom [2005] ECR I-1559, and in Case C-213/07 Michaniki [2008] ECR I-0000.

20 In that regard, the Court notes that, in the context of the cooperation between the Court and the national courts provided for by Article 234 EC, it is solely for the national court before which the dispute has been brought, and which must assume responsibility for the subsequent judicial decision, to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of the case both the need for a preliminary ruling in order to enable it to deliver judgment and the relevance of the questions which it submits to the Court (see, inter alia, Case C-306/99 BIAO [2003] ECR I-1, paragraph 88; Case C-217/05 Confederación Española de Empresarios de Estaciones de Servicio [2006] ECR I-11987, paragraph 16; and Case C-260/07 Pedro IV Servicios [2009] ECR I-0000, paragraph 28).

21 The right to determine the questions to be put to the Court thus devolves upon the national court alone and the parties may not change their tenor (see, inter alia, Case 44/65 Singer [1965] ECR 1191, 1198; Case C-412/96 Kainuun Liikenne and Pohjolan Liikenne [1998] ECR I-5141, paragraph 23; and Case C-402/98 ATB and Others [2000] ECR I-5501, paragraph 29).

22 In addition, to alter the substance of the questions referred for a preliminary ruling, or to answer the additional questions mentioned by the applicants in the main proceedings in their observations, would be incompatible with the Court's function under Article 234 EC and with its duty to ensure that the governments of the Member States and the parties concerned are given the opportunity to submit observations under Article 23 of the Statute of the Court of Justice, bearing in mind that under that provision only the order of the referring court is notified to the interested parties (see, to that effect, inter alia, Joined Cases 141/81 to 143/81 Holdijk and Others [1982] ECR 1299, paragraph 6; Case C-178/95 Wiljo [1997] ECR I-585, paragraph 30; Case C-352/95 Phytheron International [1997] ECR I-1729, paragraph 14; and Kainuun Liikenne and Pohjohlan Liikenne, paragraph 24).

23 In the present case, since the referring court has accepted neither the need nor the relevance of a question concerning the grounds for, or the circumstances of, the exclusion of the applicants in the main proceedings from the procedure for the award of the public contract in question, the Court cannot carry out an analysis in that regard.

The first question

24 By its first question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether Directive 2004/18 is applicable to a procedure for the award of a public contract initiated after the entry into force of that directive, but before the expiry of the period for transposition of it, and as a result that directive had not yet been incorporated into the national law.

25 At the outset, it should be borne in mind that, before the period for transposition of a directive has expired, Member States cannot be reproached for not having yet adopted measures implementing it in national law (see Case C-129/96 Inter-Environnement Wallonie [1997] ECR I-7411, paragraph 43 and Case C-212/04 Adeneler and Others [2006] ECR I-6057, paragraph 114).

26 Thus, in the case in the main proceedings, at the time of the initiation of the procedure for the award of the contract at issue, Directive 2004/18 had not been transposed into Hungarian national law, as the deadline for transposition had not yet passed, so that Directive 93/37 remained applicable at that stage of the procedure.

27 To the extent that the procedure at issue in the main proceedings was still on-going at the date on which the period for transposition of Directive 2004/18 expired, the question also arises whether that directive may be applicable in the main proceedings.

28 In that regard, it is apparent from the information provided by the Hungarian government at the hearing that the contracting authority's decision – to exclude the bid from the consortium set up by the applicants in the main proceedings and to continue the procedure with the two candidates who were considered to be suitable – was taken before the date on which the period for transposition of Directive 2004/18 expired.

29 It would, in those circumstances, be contrary to the principle of legal certainty to determine the law applicable to the case in the main proceedings by reference to the date of the award of the contract, when the decision which in the present case is alleged to have infringed Community law was taken before the date referred to in the previous paragraph of this judgment (see, by analogy, Case C-337/98 Commission v France [2000] ECR I-8377, paragraph 40).

30 Therefore, the answer to the first question is that Directive 2004/18 is not applicable to a decision taken by a contracting authority when awarding a public works contract before the period for transposition of that directive has expired.

The second question

31 In the light of the answer given to the first question, it is not necessary to reply to the second question.

The third question

32 By its third question, the referring court asks, in essence, whether Article 22(3) of Directive 93/37 must be interpreted as meaning that a negotiated procedure for the award of a public contract cannot be continued in the absence of a sufficient number of candidates to reach the lower limit of three candidates laid down by that provision.

33 In that regard, it should be recalled that Directive 93/37 contains, among its provisions, rules on the procedure to be followed.

34 Thus, as regards the procedure for the award of a public works contract, at least two different stages are provided for in Article 18 of Directive 93/37, that is to say, first, the possible exclusion of tenderers or candidates under Article 24 of that directive, and the verification of the suitability of the tenderers or candidates who were not excluded, in accordance with the criteria of economic and financial standing and of technical knowledge or ability referred to in Articles 26 to 29 of that directive and prescribed for the procedure in question, and, second, the award of the contract on the basis of the criteria prescribed for that procedure as laid down in Title IV, Chapter 3 of Directive 93/37 and taking into account Article 19 of that directive.

35 In the negotiated procedure, negotiations between the contracting authority and the candidates admitted to negotiate take place between the first stage referred to and the stage of awarding the contract.

36 Pursuant to Article 22(3) of Directive 93/37, where a contract is to be awarded by negotiated procedure, the number of candidates admitted to negotiate may not be less than three provided that there is a sufficient number of suitable candidates.

37 It is, therefore, apparent from the wording of that provision that the contracting authorities are, at the very least, bound – as regards the number of candidates admitted to negotiations – to respect the lower limit laid down in that provision, in so far as the number of suitable candidates so allows.

38 In that regard, any contractor who has sought an invitation to take part in the procedure in question and who, among those with the qualifications required under Articles 24 to 29 of that directive, meets the conditions of an economic and technical nature prescribed for the procedure in question, must be considered to be a 'suitable candidate' within the meaning of Article 22(3) of Directive 93/37.

39 On the one hand, a 'candidate' is defined in Article 1(h) of Directive 93/37 as a contractor who has sought an invitation to take part in a restricted or negotiated procedure.

40 On the other hand, in accordance with Article 22(1) of Directive 93/37, in negotiated procedures, the contracting authorities are – on the basis of information given relating to the contractor's personal position as well as to the information and formalities necessary for the evaluation of the minimum conditions of an economic and technical nature to be fulfilled by him – to select from among the candidates with the qualifications required under Articles 24 to 29 those whom they will invite to negotiate.

41 It follows that Article 22(3) of Directive 93/37 must be interpreted as meaning that, where a contract is to be awarded by negotiated procedure, the number of candidates invited to negotiate may not be lower than three, provided that a sufficient number of contractors have sought an invitation to take part in the procedure in question and they, among the candidates with the qualifications required under Articles 24 to 29 of that directive, meet the conditions of an economic and technical nature prescribed for the procedure in question.

42 Thus, where a contract is awarded by a negotiated procedure and the number of suitable candidates is below the lower limit prescribed for the procedure in question, a limit which cannot be less than three, the contracting authority may, nevertheless, continue with the procedure by inviting the suitable candidate or candidates to negotiate the terms of the contract.

43 As the Commission has correctly pointed out, if it were otherwise, the social need which the contracting authority has stated and defined and intended to meet by awarding the contract in question could not be satisfied, not because of a lack of suitable candidates, but on account of the fact that the number of suitable candidates was below that lower limit.

44 In the light of the foregoing, the answer to the third question is that Article 22(3) of Directive 93/37 must be interpreted as meaning that where a contract is awarded by a negotiated procedure and the number of suitable candidates is below the lower limit prescribed for the procedure in question, the contracting authority may, nevertheless, continue with the procedure by inviting the suitable candidate or candidates to negotiate the terms of that contract.

The fourth question

45 By its fourth question, the referring court asks whether the second subparagraph of Article 22(2) of Directive 93/37 is applicable to the negotiated procedure for the award of public works contracts.

46 In that regard, it should be noted that, as is apparent from the broad logic of Article 22 of Directive 93/37, the second subparagraph Article 22(2) of that provision refers only to contracts awarded by restricted procedure.

47 However, it should be observed, as is apparent from the 10th recital in the preamble to Directive 93/37, that the purpose of that directive is to develop effective competition in the field of public works contracts (see Case C-27/98 Fracasso and Leitschutz [1999] ECR I-5697, paragraph 26; Joined Cases C-285/99 and C-286/99 Lombardini and Mantovani [2001] ECR I-9233, paragraph 34; Case C-470/99 Universale-Bau and Others [2002] ECR I-11617, paragraph 89; and Case C-247/02 Sintesi [2004] ECR I-9215, paragraph 35).

48 Thus, in order to meet the objective of developing effective competition, Directive 93/37 seeks to organise the award of contracts in such a way that the contracting authority is able to compare the different tenders and to accept the most advantageous on the basis of objective criteria (Fracasso and Leitschutz, paragraph 31 and Sintesi, paragraph 37).

49 Accordingly, although the second subparagraph of Article 22(2) of Directive 93/37 provides that, where the contracting authorities award a contract by restricted procedure, the number of candidates invited to tender is in any event to be sufficient to ensure genuine competition, that provision merely refers specifically to one of the general objectives of that directive (see, to that effect, Sinesti, paragraph 36).

50 It follows that, even though Directive 93/37 does not contain a provision analogous to the second subparagraph of Article 22(2) in relation to negotiated procedures, a contracting authority which has recourse to such procedures, in the cases referred to in Article 7(2) of that directive, must none the less take care to ensure there is genuine competition.

51 In that regard, it should, first, be pointed out that, in those cases, recourse to the negotiated procedure requires the prior publication of a contract notice, intended to encourage applications. Therefore, as was stated in paragraph 14 of this judgment, that measure has been complied with in the case in the main proceedings.

52 Next, as regards the stage of negotiating for the contract, Article 22(3) of Directive 93/37 requires the contracting authority to invite a sufficient number of candidates to that stage. Whether the number is sufficient to ensure genuine competition must be assessed on the basis of the characteristics and the nature of the contract in question.

53 Lastly, if, in such a procedure, the number of suitable candidates is below the lower limit prescribed for the procedure in question – a limit which, in accordance with Directive 93/37, cannot be less than three – it must be accepted that, in so far as the conditions of an economic and technical nature for that procedure have been correctly prescribed and applied, the contracting authority has, nevertheless, ensured that there is genuine competition.

54 It follows from all of the foregoing that the answer to the fourth question is that Directive 93/37 must be interpreted as meaning that the obligation to ensure that there is genuine competition is satisfied where the contracting authority has recourse to the negotiated procedure under the conditions referred to in Article 7(2) of that directive.

Costs

55 Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the action pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court. Costs incurred in submitting observations to the Court, other than the costs of those parties, are not recoverable.

On those grounds, the Court (Fourth Chamber) hereby rules:

1. Directive 2004/18/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 31 March 2004 on the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, public supply contracts and public service contracts is not applicable to a decision taken by a contracting authority when awarding a public works contract before the period for transposition of that directive has expired.

2. Article 22(3) of Council Directive 93/37/EEC of 14 June 1993 concerning the coordination of procedures for the award of public works contracts, as amended by Directive 97/52/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 13 October 1997, must be interpreted as meaning that where a contract is awarded by a negotiated procedure and the number of suitable candidates is below the lower limit prescribed for the procedure in question, the contracting authority may, nevertheless, continue with the procedure by inviting the suitable candidate or candidates to negotiate the terms of that contract.

3. Council Directive 93/37, as amended by Directive 97/52, must be interpreted as meaning that the obligation to ensure that there is genuine competition is satisfied where the contracting authority has recourse to the negotiated procedure under the conditions referred to in Article 7(2) of that directive.
